Questions and Answers

MARGARET M., Watervliet, N. Y., writes: "I have read with pleasure of the wish expressed that President Wilson should appoint a day of prayer, as President Lincoln did several times during the Civil War. This has been on my mind for some time. At a prayer meeting I attended last Friday night the pastor said: 'This country will surely fail in the war if we trust only in greater preparedness and food production and economizing and boasting about our great resources.' I have pondered much on the question: Is the national conscience so heavily burdened that we do not dare to come into the presence of God? Last night there were street dancing and theater parties in Troy for the soldiers who are going away, but not a word of prayer. Is this America, which expects the world to look up to her as an example of all that is high and great?"

L. S., Virginia. Your case is a peculiarly sad one, but we have to present many through the Prayer League that have been seemingly hopeless. What to man is impossible, is not so with our heavenly Father, and it is well that we should implicitly trust his wisdom, and leave the whole solution in his hands, with confidence in his goodness. Ask him to guide you. Meanwhile, do your own best and use the means at hand, asking and looking for a blessing on your efforts. We have sent your letter to the Prayer League.

Mother, Wellington, Can. How can the war lords be said to keep the commandments, when they compel one man to take the life of another? My only son has been reported missing since the battle of Ypres, yet a mother's love keeps hoping against hope.

If they kept God's commandments and followed Christ's teachings, there would be no international slaughter. We sympathize with you in your sorrow and anxiety. There are many thousands of mothers all over the world in the same sad predicament.

Mrs. N. A. J., Ness City, Kan. We are each of us in duty bound to do what lies in our power to make the world better, healthier and happier. Yet there are customs and habits of long standing which cannot be changed in a day, however sincerely we may desire it.

Truth-Seeker, Plain Dealing, La. In Isa. 55 : 7 we are told that God will abundantly pardon, and that means that God will forgive just as long as there is sincere repentance. The danger for one repeatedly sinning is not that God will not forgive, but rather that by sinning one places himself where there is no more consciousness of sin. God's mercy is unlimited both as to time and quantity (Matt. 18 : 21-35; Luke 17 : 3, 4; Isa. 1 : 18; Micah 7 : 18, 19). But constant sinning against conscience hardens the heart and benumbs the conscience. There may be, even to the end, sorrow exercised because of the consequences of sin, but to him who continues to sin the conscience becomes at last benumbed, so that while it mourns over the results, it still loves the sinning and is not offended by it. God will abundantly pardon all those who forsake their ways and return to the Lord; but we must come, must return, and we must come as did the publican—humbly. Let us remember, however, that to convict another of sin belongs to God alone. Let us not judge others.

Reader, Pike County, Miss. 1. The Revised Version renders the passage in Luke 22 :32, When thou had turned again, establish thy brethren." We cannot suppose that after Peter's fall he needed conversion in the sense in which we use the word. He needed repentance and restoration. His words, his actions, and the intense devotion he had previously shown to Christ, all indicated a man already converted. He fell under temptation as Christ had foreseen, but it was a backsliding which was quickly repented of and which Christ forgave. At Pentecost, the apostolic experience was not conversion, but an enduement of power for service. 2. The passage in Gen. 32 : 30, notwithstanding Jacob's expression, is interpreted elsewhere in Scripture as referring to an angel (see Hosea 12 : 5), the conclusion of commentators being that he was the "Angel of the Covenant." Jacob was favored with visions, and several authorities including Calvin, Hessenberg, Hengstenberg and others, have held that this experience was of a similar character to that of the vision of the ladder. The majority, however, interpret it as an actual event, the object of the revelation being to revive the spirit of the patriarch and arm him with confidence in God. 3. There are no statistics to show the relative disastrous effects of the sins you mention. They are, however, closely allied, and it may well be said that each causes the other and hence one sinning in the one respect will eventually sin in the other. Under such circumstances, then, both sins have equally disastrous effects.

Mrs. G. A. E., Hadley, N. J. Life is a precious gift from God and should be so valued. Pain and suffering are to be regarded as discipline. There is no Scriptural authority to justify the view that we have a right to shorten or terminate our existence. Suicide is a crime under human law, and in the early Church it was condemned by repudiation and the denial of Christian burial. See Paul's advice to the Phillippian jailer (Acts 16 : 28; Job 14 : 14).

H. C. Y., Tolleson, Ariz. The statement in I Sam. 16 : 14 must be understood, and so must many others in the Old Testament, from the standpoint of the writer. The historians who wrote the books of Samuel and Kings were men of intense spirituality and deep piety. They looked at every event in its relation to God. Our modern histories reverse this method, and relate the circumstances, which, in the opinion of the writers, suffice to explain events, just as the ancient writers described thunder as the voice of God, and we explain it as the impact of the clouds. Modern science would probably regard Saul as a man subject to periodical attacks of insanity; but the historian of the Old Testament regards him as under the displeasure of God, who sends an evil spirit to torment him.

Mrs. G. T., Kingston, Ont. Christ's doctrine and his message are so clear that all any one in doubt has to do is to take them literally and be helped. "Come unto me, all ye that labor" (Matt. 11 : 28), is broad enough to fit the circumstances of any complainant. Do you labor, are you heavy laden? Go to him. "I am the way, the truth, and the life" (John 14 : 6). "Come now, let us reason together," (Isa. 1 : 18); "If thou canst believe, all things are possible," (Mark 9 : 23), and "If thou believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, thou shalt be saved, and thy house" (Acts 16 : 31). These passages are certainly clear enough for any one to grasp them and their meaning, and stand by the promises He has made who cannot lie.

Reader, Stevens Point, Wis., writes: "I have just read the paragraph in the Mail-Bag by W. L. J., Buffalo, N. Y., and I thought perhaps I might be able to contribute a new idea in regard to what is termed 'the collection.'

I think you will find that in churches where there is a 'parade and show over the money,' the collection is looked upon as an 'offering,' and that usually some words of presentation are used, such as 'All things come of thee, O Lord, and of thine own have we given thee.' In these days the money we give to the church represents ourselves—the labor of our hands, muscles, brains; these, through the money we present, we are offering to God. In some churches the money is presented at the same time and along with the bread and wine in the communion service. Because of these facts and what the money represents—ourselves—and because we are offering it to Almighty God, it seems proper that in thus dedicating it and ourselves some fitting ceremony of dignity and consciousness of the underlying principle should accompany the act."

W. C. J., Erie, Pa. Is there any absolute authority for that portion of the Apostles' Creed, "He descended into hell"?

The passage which is generally accepted as authority for this belief is I Peter 3 : 18, 19. Christ was put to death in the flesh but quickened by the Sp'rit, by which also he went and preached unto the "spirits in prison." See also Col. 2 : 15; and Eph. 4 : 9. "Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth?"

I Can Brighten Your Life!

What would it be worth to have health—untiring energy, buoyant spirits, perfect figure, clear complexion and the right weight for one of your stature?

Think how it would brighten your life, enable you to work without fatigue; how your capacity for enjoyment would be multiplied; and what charm it would add to your personality!

This is my life work. I have done these very things for 80,000 other women, many of whom were weak, frail, depressed and discouraged. I have made them, oh, so well! Leading physicians endorse my methods. Their wives and daughters are my pupils. Treatment in your own home—private and confidential.

"Limpy"—The Boy Who Felt Neglected

WHAT William Johnston has done in this story is to put on paper the soul of a boy of ten, who is just coming face to face with the truer values of life. No mean achievement is this, for it is a beautiful thing to look into the heart of a child and see what is hidden there.

This book has just been published and is making a big hit. A copy was sent to the secretary of the Christian Herald, and he became so interested in it that he sat up half the night reading it. If possible it interested him more than "Pollyanna." In his opinion, it is one of the most human stories that has been written in years.

Irvin S. Cobb says: "Somebody might have written a truer, sweeter, more appealing, more convincing story of a boy than 'Limpy,' but nobody ever has."

Ella Wheeler Wilcox says: "'Limpy' is very beautiful and tender and ought to have a real success. It stirs the very best in its readers."

WE will send a copy of "Limpy" and the Christian Herald for one year (new or renewal) for............ $2.25

Luther in light of recent research

Luther Anniversary Book
Luther in Light of Recent Research

WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the approaching celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous Thesis on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation. The Christian Herald has had the good fortune to secure the exclusive American rights of this book and has had it translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

The foreword to Boehmer's work by Professor J. H. Robinson of Columbia University pays a high tribute both to biographer and to the translator who has made this book so readable to the average American.

How you can find pretty hands in your dishpan

Some real experiences over "other people's" kitchen sinks

MY housekeeping began on the Pacific Coast when I was about ten years old. Mother paid me 10c a week to 'help with the dishes.' And never since have I felt richer or prouder.

Mother believed that girls can't begin too young to learn to do things right,—in the easiest, quickest and most efficient way.

She was very particular about soaps and cleaners. She said when you select a good cleaner like Gold Dust, which she always had in the house, and use it right, you get right results—hands included.

Mother taught us, too, that well-kept hands aren't a luxury.

I had been writing and housekeeping for a good many years when the business men—here on the Atlantic side—put me in a private office. They said, "Now you sit down and make yourself at home—and tell other housekeepers your experiences with Gold Dust and hands."

Then they went out and closed the door.

Perhaps they thought I would be frightened over their first commission. But I was thinking to myself, "Isn't it lucky it's Gold Dust they've asked me to write about!"

Rough hands and hard water made soft

My first visit after leaving California was in the home of a cousin in a small western town. At dishwashing time I offered to help. My cousin said, "This hard water will ruin your hands." She showed me her own.

They were harsh and red.

I found that she never used Gold Dust, and brought a package to her rescue.

We experimented and found that a heaping tablespoonful, instead of the usual rounded spoonful, to the dishpan made this hard water soft for her hands and 'grease-dissolving' for the dishes. I taught my cousin what Mother had taught me—that housekeeping needn't be a hindrance to well-kept hands. When I left Cousin Ruth three months later, she was still saving dishwashing time by using Gold Dust. Her hands had become much whiter and nice and soft, too.

Her beautiful, capable hands

About three years ago I was doing some writing at the Congressional Library. While in Washington it was my good fortune to live with one of the best housekeepers I have known. Her house was perfect and she had time for play on the outside. I asked her how she accomplished so much. She said, "I save time in little things. For instance, at my kitchen sink."

I wasn't surprised to see Gold Dust on the shelf over her dishpan. "I never waste Gold Dust," she said. "I find a rounded tablespoonful to my dishpan of water is just right."

Her hands were white, beautiful, capable hands.

"And I save my hands by exercising a reasonable care," she said. "I always rinse them in clear, tepid water and dry them thoroughly after dishwashing."

A smile that rose out of a dishpan

When I arrived in New York recently I chanced to board with a stubborn little woman who never seemed to get through at her kitchen sink. I felt sorry for her and her 'never-ending' dishes.

One night I offered to help.

"I have so much trouble with my hands because I have to keep them in water so long," she complained.

I asked her if she didn't want to feel water that was soft for her hands and see the grease disappear from the dishes.

Of course she did. So I measured out a rounded tablespoonful of Gold Dust into the dishpan. She felt the soft water and saw the grease dissolve. Then the dishes washed quickly and dried easily. She hung up her dishpan sooner than ever before. She was smiling, for Gold Dust dissolved the grease and her stubbornness at the same time.

And her hands?

She got in the habit of drying them thoroughly, and forgot to complain about them for they were improving right along.

IF you were 'brought up on Gold Dust,' and haven't used it wastefully, you will understand my long-time loyalty. If you weren't brought up on a proper use of Gold Dust, I'm wondering if you wouldn't like to try a tablespoonful in your dishpan. Then I am sure that you, too, will find that you combine good hands-keeping with good housekeeping.

You can get large and small packages of Gold Dust at your grocer's. But you can't count on getting real Gold Dust help unless you really get Gold Dust.

Questions and Anwers

C. F., Richmond, Ind. Have we passed through the death of one civilization, and are we at the birth of another? Is the present a time of experimenting, ad interim, between old and new civilizations?

As to the final outcome of the present world crisis, while men may conjecture, none can give the solution. All the nations have their share of the universal wickedness to answer for. In the shaking of the foundations of thrones and kingdoms, we are reminded of the language of Ezekiel: "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him" (21 : 27). In that ancient prophecy, which applied to Israel, we may possibly see a type of world conditions today. God's people in many lands are looking to him for the solution and are praying, hoping and believing that the universal affliction and purgation, which the world's sins has brought on itself, may be followed by a better order of things—by a Christian civilization, in which "He whose right it is" shall rule.

B. O., Laurenceville, Pa. The dead branches (John 15) are those branches of the vine that are barren, or incapable of bearing fruit, and which, according to the rules of the viticulturist, must be cleansed, pruned or wholly cut away. They typify those unprofitable or indifferent Christians who, though externally and mechanically associated with his church, have no vital or spiritual connection with it, and therefore do not aid in its growth or spiritual expansion. In the process of cleansing or pruning the branch may be saved for service in fruitbearing, although it may strip it of whatever is rank and luxuriant, in order that its whole strength may be concentrated on its proper task. So with the nominal Christian who has not yet awakened to his spiritual duties and opportunities. He may have to undergo searching discipline, which sometimes goes very deep, before he can be accepted as a "fruitful branch" of the true Vine.

Mrs. J. D., Tyrone, Pa. 1. "Casting pearls before swine" (Matt. 7 : 6) is interpreted as meaning that it is almost a hopeless task to awaken in the minds of the coarse and impure any appreciation of the priceless truths of Christianity. This caution applies to the indiscriminately zealous; but it is not intended to be taken as a general rule, but one that is applicable in unusual cases only. We should be careful lest we misjudge others, and especially careful not to look down upon them as beyond the reach of our efforts to do them good. 2. The passage in Matt. 5 : 24 teaches the duty of reconciliation. Our own hearts should be cleansed of all hatred and bitterness against others, before we ourselves ask divine forgiveness. The "brother" is not necessarily a relative, but a former friend, a neighbor, an acquaintance—any one with whom we have had social or business dealings, and who, on account of some quarrel, we now regard with harsh feelings. We are taught in this chapter (which is a part of the Sermon on the Mount) to make up our quarrels, to try to awaken the spirit of forgiveness on both sides, we ourselves taking the first step, no matter which was in the wrong. 3. See Dr. Gray's prophetic articles for answer to this question. 4. If the sermon has helped you, it would be quite in order for you to say so to the pastor, either by note or personally.

An Indiana Reader. 1. There is no age limit to Christian work, no "dead-line" beyond which a truly converted man or woman ceases to influence others. Although the burden of years may diminish physical energy, in the case of a real Christian old age is not the darkening toward sunset but the dawning of the sunrise of immortality. The aged believer has a clearer view of life and its meaning, a finer, purer faith, because of the purification of many trials, and in many cases a better capacity for advising others than a younger person of less ripe experience could possibly possess. 2. We have frequently discussed backsliding in the Mail-Bag. See recent issues of the paper. 3. Conversion may come, and doubtless often does come, through the reading of the Scriptures alone, and without any exterior aid, verbal, written or printed. Why should we wonder at this? Is not God's Word, enforced by the power of the Holy Spirit, sufficient without human aid? Missionaries tell of many cases of converts being won through the printed Gospels. If this be so in heathen lands, why not here also?

Mrs. C. T. E., Newbern, Ala. There is only one reason for the existence of the church, or any organization allied with it, and that is, the extension of the Kingdom of Christ. Extending the Kingdom is rightly separated into two divisions of work, the building up of the saints and the conversion of sinners. Any organization which keeps these two objects in mind will live; but any organization that loses sight of them will flounder helplessly and die. Your letter would seem to indicate that the churches in your town need a spiritual rebirth. As to the young people and their indifference, your people require action. Moving pictures minister to the natural desire for action and for a knowledge of the outer world. In every diversion that is popular with young people, there will be found some direct appeal either to their physical, intellectual or spiritual necessities. If the church is to hold its young people in any organization, it must show them the vision of Christian service. It must bring them to see that there is in the advancing of the Kingdom opportunity for a happy and successful employment of all their youthful energy and enthusiasm. It must make work for Christ the most logical employment of young life. It must show them where such employment yields present satisfaction as well as heavenly rewards. Perhaps your Epworth League has only met in an aimless way to discuss topics in which they had no interest. Perhaps you lack enthusiastic young leadership. In many years' experience in this work, we have reached the conclusion that it is better if no person over twenty-five holds any office in the League that can be filled by a younger member. It has happened that older members kill young people's prayer meetings, particularly if they customarily talk at length. No person except the leader should talk at length at a young people's prayer meeting.

THIS TIME LAST YEAR

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

LAST year, this time,
We grouped around the glowing logs together,
Atingle with the thrill of autumn weather.
We talked and laughed and sang dear bygone tunes—
Songs that were bright as any sleigh-bells chime,
And soft and tender as forgotten Junes.

Last year this time,
We told brave hunting stories,
And boasted of our prowess . . . of the glories
Of roughing it. Warm light fell on the faces
Of John and Tom and Jimmy in their places;
Of father, with a paper in his hand;
Warm firelight—serene and calm and bland—
Last year, this time.

But now . . .
We've locked our mountain cabin, and the fall
Has thrown a leaf-brown shroud across it all;
My brow
Is furrowed with the weight of more than years,
And father, reading, winks away the tears.
The boys? Why, John and Jim are far away
Across the main . . .
A signal fire bares the hurt, the pain,
That veil-like lies upon their boyish faces;
And Tom . . . They tell us Tom won't come again . . .

A century of strife and loss and fear
Has touched us since we saw them in their places
This time . . . last year.

E. E. S., Cresco, Iowa. Please explain Heb. 4 : 1–11.

We quote a commentator as follows: "To understand the force of the reasoning of these verses, and the naturalness of the different interpretations of the Psalm which the apostle is explaining, note that 'my rest' is primarily the rest which God enjoys (Gen. 2 : 2; Heb. 4 : 4) or which God provides (Deut. 12 : 9, 10). The first is the Sabbath rest, which God enjoyed after his work of creation was completed, and which he provided for man when he instituted the day of rest, as he did long before the giving of the law; the second is the rest of Canaan, the rest which God gave Israel. Both meanings of the word point to the rest the Gospel gives, of which the rest of the Sabbath and the rest of Canaan were types. Two other facts need to be kept in mind: the word Sabbath and Sabbath-rest (see verse 9) are Hebrew words for what is translated 'rest,' and (as a verb in Genesis) 'rested'; and the word 'entered in,' moreover, is a common word in the Old Testament for 'inheriting the earth'—taking possession of the land of promise. Hence the naturalness of the interpretation which the apostle refutes. The rest of which the Psalm speaks, and which the unbelieving miss, is not, as the word may mean, the Sabbath-rest which God instituted at the first, nor is it the rest of Canaan into which the Jews entered under the guidance of Joshua. The rest from which the disobedient Israelites were debarred was neither one nor the other, for at that time the Israelites had both. It was a rest that stood over in David's time for future realization—a rest into which those enter, and those only, who believe (see verse 3)—the rest of the Gospel, completed in the rest above. How natural this argument is may be gathered from the religious poetry of all Christian sects, and from the language employed even now to describe the divine life."

Miss H. W. P., Albany, Ore., 1. As to the fall of Satan (Luke 10 : 18) and of the angels (II Peter 2 : 4, Jude 6–13), there has been much discussion. The notion that these fallen ones are the "sons of God" mentioned in Gen. 6 : 4, and that they fell through fleshly desires, is affirmed in the book of Enoch. It is doubtful whether Jude quotes the Book of Enoch. Compare I Tim. 3 : 6. 2. In Dan. 8 : 14, "Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed" refers to the period at or after the coming of the Messiah, when the sanctuary, the temple, the seat of worship, shall be justified, that is, vindicated from profanation. Judas Maccabæus instituted the feast of cleansing by lighting, on the 25th of the ninth month, the holy fire. This is that feast of dedication kept by the Lord as recorded in John 10 : 22.

A struggling country church, which has lost all by fire and is now reorganizing, would be very grateful for any gifts of second-hand Sunday school library books. For further information interested readers can send postal to Sullivan, care of the Christian Herald.

S. B. G., Starford, Pa. Thanks for your letter. The text chosen by Pastor Herman Prange for his sermon in the Christian Herald of August 22 was: "And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it."

Old Subscriber, Knoxville, Iowa. Who ordered the flag saluted by the Americans at Vera Cruz—President Wilson or the captain of the ship? Why was it not saluted?

The salute was demanded by the American commander, Admiral Mayo, and his action was approved by the President. The salute was refused by the Mexicans from motives of pride or patriotism, and the occupation of Vera Cruz resulted on April 21, 1914.

R. M. C., Penfield, Pa. The matter is controversial. Some hold it as essential, others as a duty, yet one which may be omitted when impracticable.

Exciting Days in Petrograd

Frenzied Finance and Famine Prices—A Nation Drunk With Freedom Slowly Returning to Reason

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

Received by Special Messenger Direct From Petrograd

RUSSIA is slowly finding herself, and public confidence in the present government, which more than any other existing is of, for and by the common people, is slowly growing. Conditions are far brighter than they were a week ago, when I reached Petrograd, with affairs at their lowest ebb. Time and patience are needed, but self-restraint and self-confidence distinguish this government, which typifies the movement toward democracy throughout the world.

Last week the State Bank issued 268,000,000 rubles in bank notes. Russia is facing democracy and liberty. But her main difficulty may be the well-known danger of frenzied finance.

Petrograd is far from gay in these anxious hours when a worthy ministry is striving to avert anarchy and repulse a foreign foe; but it is well dressed and pleasing to the eye. With shoes costing from thirty to two hundred rubles, Petrograd women are the best dressed and the best shod I have ever seen, and I include not only Paris, Cairo and Monte Carlo in peace times, but New York and San Francisco as well. The Nevsky Prospekt is a broad, monotonous thoroughfare resembling One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street in Harlem, but many of the women who crowd it from early afternoon to midnight would grace Fifth Avenue or the boulevards of Paris.

Much of this may be due to unaccustomed riches, but sudden wealth, especially when coupled with exorbitant prices, does not explain taste and chic, which the Petrograd women certainly have. The saddest sight in Petrograd is not the women of the demimonde, products of life in a spirited capital, but tired, anxious girls of tender years—mere children, who watch and wait on that wide path of the hunter and the huntress—pitiful products of the war itself.

Petrograd in war time is a city of charity. People give generously with a smile on their faces. I am shamed by their underlying spirit of socialistic sympathy. Their giving savors more of willing sharing than of stiff-necked largesse. If this spirit—of which abundant evidence is not lacking—can dominate socialistic Russia, this land of a million dreams will furnish a worthy example to those blessed lands whose common life and common sympathy entitle them to the name of commonwealth.

With a ministry, nine of whose fifteen members are avowedly socialists, Russia is free from anarchy. With a government headed by young men, there is an admirable sense of self-restraint. Faced with undreamed-of powers and responsibilities, she has so far escaped the insane autocracy of the mob, because the Russian, who is subject to reason rather than stampede, hates autocracy, whether it be called by the name of monarch, capital, militarism, navalism, or mob law. He starts life without an India, a Tripoli, a Bagdadbahn, or a Belgian Congo to explain away or condone. No wonder he can stand firmly on the platform of "no annexations and no indemnities"; for the prize he sought is already in his hands. If it can only last!

Russia cannot be changed in a day, but let it be remembered that the nation that abolished serfdom when we abolished slavery has in three years changed from drunkenness to sobriety, and her mighty millions, once bondmen, are now free! Whatever the future may bring, she has had her hour of glory through self-control in the midst of revolution, and when strong men have once known the glory of common weal and common woe, they greet the future with a sense of brotherhood in their eyes.

The uncouth Russian, crossing himself mechanically, may seem ill prepared for democracy, but into his being years of habit have built up or revealed a something which has made the nations wonder at his innate worth. May Red Russia, in the heyday of her power and pride, not forget the still small voice!

A FELLOW American, here in Petrograd, has told me of an article in an American magazine which represents the working people of Russia as getting tremendously increased salaries. Any writer on conditions in Russia who pictures the workers as being vastly overpaid is either wilfully misleading or inexcusably careless. The probable difficulty is that some unthinking person has computed these salaries as reported on the basis of the ruble being worth its normal value of fifty cents gold, when any New York or Chicago magazine can learn at the bank that rubles are nominally worth only twenty cents, gold.

But that does not tell the whole story. The twenty-cent nominal value is fixed by government regulation, to prevent the too rapid depreciation of the ruble. A prominent business man here offered to pay down in Petrograd six rubles for every dollar gold credited to his account for goods in New York. He would not give me that rate, since I can neither deliver goods nor gold, and the government fixes the rate that I can receive on my letter of credit. However, it is not putting the value too low if we count the ruble, which is rapidly decreasing in value, as being at present worth twenty cents, instead of its normal value of fifty cents. That makes those inflated salaries dwindle a little.

I must warn you that what I say of Petrograd does not, cannot, apply to all of Russia and Siberia. In some places the ruble may buy less. In most places it will probably buy considerably more, just as the dollar will buy more hothouse grapes in some parts of the United States than in others. In Russia this difference is increased by the inadequacy of transportation facilities. For instance, in Siberia I bought some delicious butter for a ruble, twenty kopecks for a Russian pound, which equals nine-tenths of a pound avoirdupois. In Petrograd such butter cannot be had without great difficulty, and the price, if you can buy it at all, is six rubles a Russian pound.

YESTERDAY a very prominent American, whose name would be known to many of you, said, with a slightly petulant air, "Prices here depress me. I have plenty of money, but I can't think straight and concentrate my mind when I consider what it costs me simply to live."

I replied, "It is exactly the same way with me. I have found a fine interpreter, who can interpret life as well as language, and I feel that with his help I am worth five times as much. In fact, he is indispensable. But I have had to give up lunch entirely in order to feel at ease in securing his services. So I eat black bread and drink tea for breakfast, and have a good substantial meal at six or seven, and let the cost of my luncheon help pay my interpreter."

Did you ever see a well-bred and well-to-do man turn his double cuffs inside out after the outside was soiled? I have seen men who have handsome salaries, paid in gold, doing this thing here in Petrograd. They can well afford to pay a ruble and a half to have their shirts laundered. But it goes against the grain of any reasonably careful man to pay such prices. When he knows that he can buy a spotless collar at home for fifteen cents or a quarter, it jars him a little to pay half a ruble to have one laundered.

The other day I attended a luncheon given by the American Luncheon Club. In many ways, aside from the speeches, it was the best food value I have received in Petrograd. It cost sixteen rubles a plate, and every cent of that money went into food, as the price was determined by the amount of food consumed. I have it on good authority that street car conductors in Petrograd get one hundred and sixty rubles a month. Figure that at the rate of two rubles to the dollar and the conductor is overpaid. Figure it in terms of ten meals, whose value in New York in 1916 (when I was there last) would have been a dollar apiece, and that magnificent salary loses its formidable aspect.

At the luncheon I mentioned to my table companion the fact that it seemed a pity to me that, with butter, eggs, berries, milk, white bread and chickens selling for very little in Siberia and even in European Russia, such things sold for exorbitant prices in Petrograd, only a few hours away by rail. The remark evidently got under his collar, for he replied gruffly.

"After you have been here a year you will forget it," he said. "That's the way with you newspaper men. You come in here and kick because you can't have sugar in your tea and can't get milk at all. But what does that have to do with Russia? You let your personal inconvenience color your judgment, and blame the railways because you can't have white bread."

I did some thinking. What was inconvenience to me meant suffering to some, and will be increasingly so. What of the two million poor of Petrograd? Two days ago I ate a meal that was almost too much for me. The people in that dingy hole were common soldiers and laborers. Some fared worse than I, but few of them could have eaten less and called it a meal. Hard black bread without butter,—a hunk that would make two ordinary slices. A plate of dark but not thick soup, greasy, but without a taste of meat in it. Some bony fish, from which, after much effort, I extracted a tablespoonful of food. That was all. The man who paid just ahead of me had had the same, and the price was not raised for my benefit. Two rubles, seventy-five.

An izvoshtchik—a plain but comfortable carriage, with a big upstanding Russian horse, cost before the war thirty-five kopecks an hour. A hundred kopecks equal one ruble. The price to-day is fifteen rubles an hour! Which, of course, makes the driver wealthy, yet not so that you can notice it, for horse-feed is very expensive. If I were food-controller in Petrograd, there would not be a pleasure carriage left in the city. For a horse eats more than a man. And even hay requires transportation, since it does not grow in the cobbled squares.

BUYING a pair of shoes in Petrograd is a day's work. You must first get the certificate of your house committee that you need a pair of shoes. Then you must stand in line for a day, perhaps, to be told that there are none of your size. One shoe store distributed ten thousand shoe tickets, numbered consecutively, which means that if I want a pair of shoes for a hundred and fifty rubles, and draw No. 9847, I can get the shoes about thirty-nine working days from now, with a liberal number of holiday and religious festivals added to the usual number of Sundays. But by that time, the store may have sold out every shoe that will fit me. A woman of the laboring classes can have a shoddy pair of shoes made to order for thirty or forty rubles.

Sometimes a man needs a suit of clothes. If he simply needs covering for his body, he may get a suit for four hundred rubles, but one of Uncle Sam's badly underpaid consular or diplomatic agents cannot wear such a suit. He must pay seven hundred at least!

Petrograd is probably the largest wood-burning city in the world. Wood for heating as well as cooking is absolutely necessary to human life in winter. A missionary told a friend of mine that it would cost him more than a thousand rubles for wood to heat his home this winter, and missionaries are not extravagant folks.

This morning we met a spick-and-span matron, bringing back a heavy loaf from the bread line. The government has taken the most stringent measures to keep the price of this necessity low, and it is low. A Russian pound costs only fourteen kopecks, which means seven pounds for a ruble; but each person is allowed only three-fourths of a pound a day. A small can of cheap sardines costs two rubles, and wholesome but not tasty bologna costs a ruble forty a pound, while fresh meat costs from two and a half rubles up.

I bought a pound of raisins for two rubles and got a bargain, for although they were small and mussy there was an ounce or two of live fresh meat in them. I passed a candy-vender's cart with three friends and we had some nice little samples, which cost two rubles for four bites. With vodka abolished, the people yearn for sweets and they pay for them.

THE other evening a kind but extravagant friend named to me a restaurant where he said food was cheap and excellent. As there was music, there was an admission charge, but the quality of the food made up for that, he said. I paid the three rubles admission, saw that soups were four rubles a portion and meats from twelve to sixteen, and ordered a bottle of mineral water. I had lost my appetite as well as my three rubles' admission.

A friend coaxed me to buy a pint bottle of buttermilk, as he called it. It was cheap and filling, only seventy kopecks. I can still taste that "buttermilk," and I shall never be able to take that particular type of nourishment again. I can drink goat milk in Palestine, water buffalo milk in Egypt, cocoanut milk in Ceylon, and condensed milk in China. But another glass of Petrograd "buttermilk" would send me gladly to my grave.

In China my food bill for five days amounted to seventy cents, and I had all I could eat, including rice cooked as no other people can cook it, eggs that were so fresh that they reminded me of American children, and peaches that dripped luscious sweetness all over my shirtfront. I was well fed, and my men were well fed for half as much. Yet I suppose some people who envy the nouveaux riches among the Russian workers pity the poor Chinaman, who can't get more than two pounds of well-cooked rice for a cent. A cash in Szechuan buys as much food as a kopeck in Petrograd, and there are 3,000 cash in a gold dollar.

The cable charges and the cost of rubles combine to make an interesting problem in personal finance. At the last report there was approximately half a ruble difference on every dollar between the New York ruble rate and the Petrograd rate. With cables so cheap, it would seem better to cable for rubles in New York than to cash a letter of credit here. But wait a minute.

It takes at least eight days to get a reply cable from New York. Assuming that four days of this time pass between the time the rubles are bought in New York and the time they are delivered in Petrograd, the ruble rate here may drop so fast that in the four days the difference is more than eaten up, and one is out not only the actual difference, but the cost of cabling as well.

A PROMINENT American professor now in Petrograd listened to the advice of friends in America and bought rubles there some months ago. The rate here decreased so fast that a week ago he started to cover by buying gold with half of his supply of rubles. He had to have a government permit in order to do this, and the formality took a week. Not only had he lost something on each ruble, due to the depreciation since he bought them in New York, but the depreciation during those seven days of formality meant that on a comparatively small amount of money he had to pay five hundred rubles more for the amount of gold he had petitioned for than he would have paid the day he applied.

You may say, "We are not interested in the troubles of Americans in Russia. What we want to know is how all this affects the Russian people. The answer is easy. If the ruble is falling in value so fast that one American can lose five hundred rubles in one week on a small transaction, how much will it ultimately affect the working classes?

At the time of the revolution wages were increased about three hundred per cent. In a considerable number of cases they secured a bonus to cover the difference of wages between January first and the middle of March. In a few very rare cases, they demanded and got a bonus amounting to the difference of wages since the beginning of the war.

These large bonuses doubtless account for many a fine pair of shoes and cobweb hats on the Nevsky today; but since the rise in wages in March, there has been no further advance among the laboring classes. Yet prices are soaring higher and higher every day. As long as the people keep down their menu to black bread and the five eggs a week which each person is allowed, they can dress better and have more money for amusements or reading material. But if they gratify an appetite for meat or other delicacies, they are no better off than before, for the prices on these commodities have increased three hundred per cent too.

THE next revolution to be looked for, as far as wages are concerned, is among the clerks and middle classes, whose position demands that they dress well, for their wages have advanced scarcely fifty per cent. and the clothing and delicacy market has advanced to meet the onslaught of millions of laborers with unwonted sums. A typewriter in Petrograd must wear last year's dress made over, or live on black bread. And at that she may see an unskilled working girl wearing better shoes and a thinner waist than she can afford.

The situation in Petrograd then amounts to this: the laboring classes received a big advance in wages immediately after the revolution, but have had practically no advances since. Meanwhile the prices on the bare necessities of life have been prevented from rising by government control. But the prices on everything else have been steadily rising, due both to the depreciation of the ruble and—the inability to get more goods at any price. In general, the working classes are much better off than they were in March, but this is only true if they practice frugality and curb the impulse that comes with cheap money to emulate the drunken sailor. If you want a laborer's job for two hundred twenty-cent rubles a month, come on over; but hurry, for the rubles may be worth only a dime soon, and in any case it will only buy one pear or two apples now.

Akron, the Rubber Metropolis

The Wonder City That Has Set the World on Rubber Wheels—By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1917, by Frank G. Carpenter

IT is now almost twenty years since I received my first assignment to write a letter on the rubber industry. I then had to travel more than three thousand miles to get the stuff. My first port of destination was Para at the mouth of the Amazon, and I rode for several weeks on that mighty stream through what were then the chief rubber lands of the globe. Today, the industrial demands of the war have given me a second rubber assignment, and I have come to this little city of Akron, in the heart of the North American continent. I am now on the roof of the interior state of Ohio, 600 miles from any seaport, thousands of miles from the equatorial forests of Brazil, and more than half way round the world from Malaysia, where are situated the rubber plantations from which the chief part of the world's product now comes.

SINCE I wrote that first letter the rubber industry has bounced to the top of the world's great necessities; the center of production of the raw material has traveled from the wilds of South America to the cultivated estates of tropical Asia, and Akron has become the chief rubber manufacturing city of the world. It is now producing more than one-third of all the rubber goods made by mankind, and its output this year will be so great that it could give $10 worth of such goods to every family in the United States and have some to spare.

The motor traffic of today is cushioned on Akron. The tires turned out here last year exceeded eleven millions in number, and that product will be doubled within a few months to come. The output at present is about forty thousand tires every day, or enough to equip ten thousand vehicles while the sun rises and sets. There are now more than three thousand acres of floor space here which are devoted to making rubber tires only; and there are companies which make vast quantities of tires and at the same time other rubber goods of every description.

I VISITED one plant which sends out rubber bands by the carload, making enough every week to bury from sight a team of horses and a dozen men standing around them. It makes rubber belts and conveyors which are miles in extent, and for hospital use rubber sheets which together would cover acres. Akron has factories that make rubber goods for every possible want, from the nipple that feeds milk to the baby to the hot water bottle that warms the chilled feet of the aged. It makes rubber boots for the trenches and diving suits for going under the sea. It makes dirigible balloons for piercing the clouds and airplane tires to soften the descent of the great flying machines as they land from the skies. It makes, in short, so many things of rubber that the names alone would take more space than I have for this letter. Many of its products are of vital necessity to us in our war with the Germans, and the most of the factories are now working on war orders. There are thirty establishments all told. They cover thousands of acres, and some of the larger of them have as many as 10,000 men and women laboring away under one roof.

But before I describe these great Akron factories, I want to tell you of the mighty changes that are going on in the rubber industry. During my stay here, I have talked with rubber experts from other parts of the world, and through the chief officials of the plants am able to give you some idea of the situation today. First, let me tell you what rubber is. It does not come from one tree only. It is a milky fluid which is found in the bark of more than 300 trees and vines which grow near the equator. It also exists in a shrub of the Mexican deserts, and is found in certain African roots. There are some trees, however, that produce far more rubber than others; and there are four varieties of crude rubber which are of especial importance. The species known as Hevea is the best of all rubber, and it comes either from the Amazon valley or is a descendant of trees that grow there.

Twenty years ago the wild trees of equatorial Brazil were the chief source of the rubber of the world, and they are still producing a large part of the product. From the mouth of the Amazon all the way up its winding course to its source in the Andes, a distance almost as far as from New York to San Francisco, there is a dense forest which, in places, is wider than from St. Paul to St. Louis. This is spotted with rubber trees, which grow wide distances apart here and there through the woods. They extend ever a territory one-third as large as the whole United States, but they are so far apart that the rubber gatherer has to walk miles every day in collecting the milk from the trees he has tapped.

Right at the start. Crepe rubber as it comes from the plantation

DURING my stay in the Amazon valley I visited some of the rubber camps and even made some rubber myself. The rubber trees there look much like the English ash. They grow to a height of about sixty feet. Their bark is silver gray, but it turns black after tapping. The trunks of the full-grown trees are as big around as a man's waist, and after they have been tapped, they swell out at the base so that they are much larger. The trees blossom in August and they bear nuts in December and January. When the nuts are ripe the shells burst with a noise like a firecracker, throwing them far and wide about the tree. There are so many nuts on each tree that a man could gather enough in a day to plant a hundred acres of land. It takes, however, from fifteen to twenty years for a wild tree of the Amazon forest to produce rubber, and so far no plantations of any importance have been set out in that region.

Up until about seven years ago practically all of the world's supply of crude rubber came from the Amazon. It was gathered by Indians, some of whom were debt slaves. Immigrants were also brought in from other parts of Brazil. Much of the work was done by contract labor, and a large percentage of the men died in the forests.

The means of gathering the sap and turning it into rubber were rude to an extreme, and the trees were often destroyed by bad tapping. The rubber I made was from trees which I gashed with a hatchet, the blade of which was about two inches wide. I put a tin cup under each gash, and the next day went from tree to tree and brought in half a gallon of milk. I then came back to the camp and smoked the rubber as the Brazilians directed. I made a fire of palm nuts in the corner of a shed, under a little clay chimney. This caused a dense smoke, into which I thrust a wooden paddle I had dipped in the sap. The paddle came out coated with milk. I turned it rapidly about in the smoke and the rubber hardened upon it. I again thrust it into the bowl for a fresh coat of milk, which I hardened in the same way, and thus went on until I had built up layer after layer of rubber on my paddle. The smoke came into my eyes. I wept almost as many tears as there were drops of milk in the bowl, and finally, having made an ounce or so of rubber, I handed the job over to the professionals. They added to the layers until they finally built up a rubber lump as large as a football. It was much like a well-smoked twenty-five-pound ham, and when cut open the inside seemed very like cheese. It is in the shape of these hams that most of the rubber from the Amazon comes. It is gathered in this rude way from camps scattered over a vast territory, and the organization of the business is such that the crop is greatly restricted.

TODAY the world demand for rubber has so increased that the wilds of the Amazon could not possibly supply it. The Brazilians are pushing their work to the full, but their product is only about one-fourth of the rubber that comes into the market. The balance, or three-fourths of the whole, is from rubber plantations which have been set out on the Malay peninsula and in Ceylon and Sumatra. We are now starting plantations in the Philippines, one having a hundred thousand trees there on the island of Basilan, not far from Mindanao.

The cultivated rubber is steadily increasing in quantity, and I am told that it will continue to keep pace with the demand. At the end of last year there were almost two million acres of cultivated rubber trees, and many new plantations are being set out. Some of the largest rubber companies of the United States are preparing to grow their own rubber. There is one in New England that has three plantations in Sumatra, comprising 100,000 acres. It has 44,000 of these already planted, and in 1915 it gathered more than 1,000,000 pounds of rubber from the 15,000 acres of trees that had come into bearing. The president of another of our great rubber companies has advised his stockholders that he can produce rubber on their Sumatra plantations at a cost of 17 cents a pound, and that 15 per cent. of their crude rubber needs will be taken care of this year from their own plantations. Next year they expect to increase this product to 25 per cent., and by 1921 they will be raising half of all the rubber they use.

There is a big rubber company here in Akron, which makes all sorts of goods, that has just bought 21,000 acres of land in Sumatra, and another, devoted only to tires, will set out large plantations in Southern Asia for the same purpose. Another American company has $10,000,000 invested in rubber estates. It has 14,000 employees on them, and all but 200 of these receive a salary of 15 cents a day. When it is remembered that the lowest wage paid a common laborer in Akron is 37 cents an hour, the difference in conditions between Asia and the United States may be appreciated. The Asiatic rubber coolie works ten hours or more per day. He gets a cent and a half an hour, while the lowest paid of the Akron rubber laborers gets more than twenty times as much.

MOST of the rubber plantations belong to the British and they control the supply of plantation rubber through their possession of the East Indies. This is the reason why, up to the beginning of the war in Europe, London was the world's greatest rubber market, practically all the crude rubber being carried in British ships. In fact, England can dictate to the world how much rubber each country may have. She did this as soon as the war broke out, cutting off the supply of the Central Powers and placing an embargo on all crude rubber produced within British territory. Until we entered the war, we were allowed to get rubber only by depositing bonds in London, through the rubber companies, that none of our manufactures would go to the Germans, and this notwithstanding the British colonies were receiving something like $150,000,000 for the crude rubber brought into the United States. I understand that these bonds have since been returned. The setting out of our own plantations in Sumatra, which belongs to the Dutch, will, to a certain extent, relieve us of our dependence on Great Britain. Other countries are starting similar movements, and especially the Japanese, who have done a great deal in rubber since the war began. The Japanese have 147 plantations on the island of Johore, opposite Singapore, and these cover more than 85,000 acres. The Nayo Rubber Cultivation Company, a Japanese firm, was established last year with $1,000,000 capital. The Dutch have many plantations in Sumatra and Java, and they have large tracts of land in Borneo and other islands, which will grow excellent rubber.

THE story of how the rubber industry was freed from the domination of Brazil is interesting. The manufacture of rubber goods on a more or less extensive scale is sixty years old, and for forty and more of these years Brazil controlled the markets of the world. The prices went up and up, and when the automobiles came in, with their great demand for tires, there was a rubber famine and the price of crude rubber rose to more than $3 a pound. When I was in the Amazon valley, it was something like a dollar a pound, and the difference between this and the cost of plantation rubber may be known when, as I have said, one of our companies can now produce it in Sumatra for 17 cents a pound.

The Brazilians appreciated that they had a good thing in their rubber trees, and for a long time they prevented the seeds of these trees being taken out of the country. An agent of the government of India was sent to Brazil, and he tried to export them. He failed twice, but was finally able to ship a large quantity in especially designed baskets, by labeling them as rare botanical specimens. The seeds were sent to Ceylon and there planted by thousands. Most of them failed to sprout and only three matured and grew into Hevea trees. From those three seeds came the rubber estates which now produce three-fourths of all the world's product. The amount last year was more than 300,000,000 pounds, and it can be so increased that it can supply all the demands of the world of the future. The development of the plantations was slow. The seeds were taken from Brazil forty years ago, and it was not until 1900 that 4,000 acres had been planted. Five years later the number of acres was 93,000 and this has now risen to almost 2,000,000.

Part of Akron's 3,000 acres of floor space devoted to the building of rubber tires

TODAY it is known that rubber can be grown successfully almost anywhere along the equator, where there is as much as one hundred inches of rainfall. It has been found that the best soil for it is Malaysia and Sumatra, and that the trees can be tapped there within five or six years after planting. They are now setting out from eighty to one hundred and twenty-five trees to the acre, and the yield averages about two and three-fourths pounds of rubber per tree every year. The cultivation is scientifically carried on, and the tapping is so done that it does not affect the life of the tree. The tapper uses a knife especially adapted to the work, and at each tapping he shaves off a slice of the bark so thin that it would take thirty of them to equal an inch. He cuts this off day by day throughout the month, and that in such a way that it takes three years to go round the tree. At the end of this time the bark of the starting-place has been renewed and it is ready for tapping again. The trees are tapped every day in the year, and the rubber milk is so

The War Work Council—and Its Aims

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

MISS ESTELLE PADDOCK, who is in charge of the publicity of the Y. W. C. A. War Work Council, leaned back in her office chair and smiled at me.

"How much," she questioned, "how much do you really know about our campaign?"

I looked rather hurriedly away from Miss Paddock, and my eyes took in the details of her very businesslike office with its filled-to-overflowing desk. Like all the other offices in the new Y. W. C. A. building, it was complete, efficient. And yet there was something about Miss Paddock something vital that transformed even her office into a room subtly different from other offices.

"Why," I answered meekly after the pause had grown a bit oppressive, "I fear that I don't know anything about it!"

"Then," said Miss Paddock, and there was mirth as well as seriousness in her eyes, "I had better tell you everything, hadn't I?"

And she did.

"When the country last April was plunged into war, the National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association found itself facing a new and huge responsibility—the responsibility for helping safeguard moral conditions in the neighborhood of training-camps and providing for the welfare of women in special industries created by the unusual conditions of war. And so the Board, with its characteristic promptness and dispatch, organized a committee of women who immediately voted a million dollars to the work. This million will be spent in the six following ways:

"To enable the Y. W. C. A. to send out trained investigators to learn the needs of women and girls in localities adjoining military and naval training-camps, and to report on the resources available in these communities for caring for their women and girls.

"To pay the salaries of especially equipped women as directors, girls' work secretaries, club leaders, physical directors, and cafeteria managers in such centers as are determined by the council to be needing the help of the Y. W. C. A.

"To furnish rent and equipment for houses and club rooms and cafeterias for the girls resident in the communities near the camps, and aids in securing housing accommodations for young women who are strangers in the city.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Argentine heavy artillery at field practice. The army of this southern republic is well equipped

LIMITED Freedom for Belgium. Dispatches from Berne on September 26 claimed to quote a German official statement to the effect that Germany would be willing to conclude peace on the basis of the evacuation of Belgium, and that Germany would contribute a share of the compensation to be paid to Belgium for war damages, provided Belgium would give a guarantee that there would not be in the future any such menace as that which threatened Germany in 1914, would maintain the administrative separation of the Flanders and Walloon districts introduced by Germany, and would grant Germany the right to develop her economic enterprises freely in Belgium, especially in Antwerp. This statement is regarded in Allied capitals merely as a peace feeler and it is hardly to be expected that the Allied governments would give validity to the German claim of Belgian intrigue against Germany with France and England prior to the war, by asking Belgium to subscribe to such a guarantee as Germany is said to suggest.

Preparing the Fleet. The Committee on public Information announced on September 26 that there were then building on the stocks 1,036 cargo vessels of 5,924,700 tons capacity. It was announced that most of these vessels would be completed before the end of 1918, and that some of them would be launched within sixty days. The total world tonnage available for ocean carrying at present is about 31,000,000 tons. There are now in American registry about 458 ships of an aggregate tonnage of 2,871,359, which does not include 117 German and Austrian ships totaling 170,285 tons. It was announced on September 27 that the government on October 15 would requisition every American ship above 2,500 tons dead weight capacity.

Germany and South America. The Argentine minister at Berlin telegraphed on September 23 that the German government had repudiated the suggestion for sinking ships without trace in the Luxburg dispatches. This disavowal prevented the declaring of war by Argentina. It did not prevent the Argentine Chamber of Deputies from passing by 53 to 18 a resolution in favor of a rupture of relations with Germany which had passed the Senate the week before. The President of Argentina is said to oppose a break in relations. In the meantime mobilization of the Argentine navy had been ordered and a strike involving more than 200,000 workers on the Argentine railroads had paralyzed traffic within the nation, cables and land wires were severed, and the government placed army and navy details in charge of the water works and electric light plants. Radical measures were taken to restore order. Peru on September 26 demanded from Germany satisfaction within eight days for the sinking of the Peruvian bark, Lorton. The government of Costa Rica has broken with Berlin. On September 26 a special commission of the Uruguayan Congress headed a demonstration in Buenos Aires favoring a rupture of relations with Germany.

Not Stretching It a Bit

FRANK CARPENTER tells this week only a part of the Story of Rubber. Interesting as this part is, the rest, the tale told next week of the Transformation of Rubber into Merchandise, is more gripping.

Religion in the camps? Certainly. The chaplains, the Y. M. C. A., the Fosdick Commission, and other special agencies are doing all that can be done to bring the soldier to the Saviour and to make plain to him the way of life. Next week Abby Gunn Baker reveals some of the elements of the Vital Christian Work in the Camps near the nation's Capital.

Not next week, but soon, a new department, which will give voice to many an unuttered longing of the woman on the farm, and which will help to unite the women, the thousands of them who are doing really big things, into a company of cooperators for a better country.

Cutting the Price. President Wilson on September 24 finally approved prices of steel plates which had been agreed upon by the steel interests and the War Industries Board. Steel plates were priced at $65 per ton, steel bars at $58, and steel shapes at $60, these prices to govern all work not covered by existing contracts, and to be made to the United States, the Allies and the public.

The Biggest Money Bill. The Senate on September 25 passed what was said to be the largest appropriation measure ever enacted by any legislative body in the history of the world. The measure was the Urgent Deficiency Bill carrying appropriations of about $8,000,000,000. The bill appropriated outright $5,606,000,000 and authorized the making of contracts to involve an additional $2,385,000,000. The army is to receive $4,352,000,000 of the total and the navy $573,000,000.

For Higher Wages. The soft coal miners of the country on September 25 demanded an immediate wage increase which the operators asserted could not be granted on the basis of the government fixed price. The controversy was finally put up to the President. The men were working under a tentative contract signed in April, under which they received a 20 per cent. increase which was to last until March 21, 1918, but the miners claimed that the radical increase of the cost of living made the wages fixed in April insufficient.

Unitarians Back the President. Stirred to action by a series of pacifist resolutions proposed by Rev. John Haynes Holmes of New York City at the Unitarian Convention in Montreal on September 26, ex-President Taft delivered an impassioned speech in which he declared: "The Allies are fighting for a principle the maintenance of which affects the future of civilization. If they do not achieve it they have sacrificed the flower of their youth and mortgaged their future for a century, and all for nothing. . . . The Allies cannot concede peace until they conquer it. . . . Stamp on all proposals of peace as ill-advised or seditious, and then time will make for our certain victory. . . . Every fact as the war has developed forms one more circumstance in which the irrefragable case against Germany as the power responsible for this world disaster. . . . She alone is responsible for the destruction of this war. . . . And now her emperor, her Prussian military caste, and her wonderful but blinded people have the blood of the millions who have suffered in this world catastrophe on their hands." Following his speech Mr. Taft moved this resolution, which was adopted 136 to 6: "That it is the opinion of this Unitarian Conference that this war must be carried to a successful issue to stamp out militarism in this world, and that this Unitarian body approves the measures of President Wilson and Congress."

A New Censorship. The Trading With the Enemy Act finally passed by Congress contained the provision referred to in last week's Christian Herald by which an English translation of any material regarding the government of the United States or any nation engaged in the present war, which is to be printed in any foreign language, must be filed at the postoffice. Postmaster General Burleson announced on September 25 that while the language of the act was broad enough to hold up any seditious matter, whether printed in English or any other language, only those

The Bible at the Front

*A SERMON BY REV. DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.

TEXT—Deut. 31 : 25, 26: "And Moses commanded the Levites . . . saying, Take this Book of the Law and put it in the side of the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord your God."

THE ark of the covenant was the visible symbol of the presence of God. In other words, it stood for Christ, whose other name was Immanuel, which being interpreted is, "God with us." It was very appropriate that the Scriptures or "Book of the Law" should be placed in the side of the ark which thus symbolized the divine presence; inasmuch as the Incarnate Word and the written Word are complementary each to the other; so that together they furnish a complete revelation or "unveiling" of God.

This ark of the covenant was carried at the forefront when Israel was on the march; because it was rightly supposed that the welfare of the nation was involved in loyalty to the Messiah, who was called "the Hope of Israel," and in obedience to the Book of the Law. For this reason the attack of the enemy was centered upon the Ark of the Covenant. It was assumed that, if that were taken, the hope and courage of Israel would go. For a like reason the assault upon Christianity is directed against Christ and the Bible in these days.

The Temple in Jerusalem was supported by two pillars called Jachin and Boaz; if they fell the temple would come rattling down. They correspond to the two fundamental and vital propositions of our faith, to wit, that Christ is the veritable Son and that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God. If these doctrines fall there is nothing left of our religion worth fighting for.

BUT though we speak after this manner we have no misgivings; for "Christ abideth ever," and by the same token the Bible stands as an impregnable rock, a very Gibraltar in its power to resist all assaults upon it. There is scarcely an ancient city of the world which has not been illuminated with bonfires of Bibles; yet the Book survives without the smell of fire upon it. Our great libraries are cemeteries, full of dead volumes which flourished, like Cæsars and Pharaohs in their day, only to be wrapped in byssus and laid away in mummy-crypts; but the Bible, the oldest of them all, is still the best seller in the book-markets of the world! How shall we account for it?

The friends of revelation are not frightened by the loud boasting of its adversaries; such as that "The book has outlived its usefulness," and "The learning of the world is against it," and "Nobody really believes it any more." All this would be amusing were it not that so many thoughtless people are in danger of mistaking Bombastes Furioso for the angel Gabriel. It calls to remembrance an incident that recently occurred on Fifth Avenue, New York, when the Seventh Regiment was marching by. A little girl who, attended by her nurse and a very noisy dog, had been watching the parade from her mother's porch, ran out and called to an upper window, "Mother, mother, come quick; Gyp's going to bite the army!" It is not because the Bible is in danger that a defense is called for; but only because the shouting in the ranks of the Philistines may lead the unwary astray by conveying the impression that the victory is going the wrong way.

So far is this from the truth of the situation that I am emboldened to lay down this proposition: The Bible is at the forefront of every great movement making for light and humanity and civilization throughout the world today.

IN supporting that proposition let us affirm at the outset that the Bible stands foremost in maintaining the sanctions of domestic life. This, to begin with, because all civilization centers in the home and radiates from it. There is no picture of happiness to compare with "love in a cottage," where parents and children gather around the family altar. Blessed are they who can look back through the lengthening vista of years to the training of such a home. Its memory never fades. I am sorry for the man whose deepest heart does not respond to the solemn pathos of "The Cotter's Saturday Night." What makes a home like that? The Bible! The whole world knows that this assures the happiness of domestic life.

The Bible leads the way, also, in the betterment of social life. It stands for law and order and all the conditions that make a community a desirable place to live in.

If you were on your way westward in search of a desirable place to settle down and "grow up with the country," and if, in your loneliness and uncertainty, the open door of a wayside house should disclose a Bible on the table, you would instantly say, "I can safely sleep here tonight." And suppose that, the next morning on awakening, you should hear the ringing of church bells, would you not say, "This is the town for me"?

In this connection it may be well to recall the words of James Russell Lowell: "When the keen scrutiny of skeptics has found a place on this planet ten miles square, where a decent man can live in decency, comfort and security, supporting and educating his children unspoiled and unpolluted, a place where age is reverenced, infancy respected, womanhood honored, and human life held in due regard—when skeptics can find such a place, ten miles square, on this globe, where the Gospel of Christ has not gone and cleared the way and laid the foundations and made decency and security possible, it will then be in order for the skeptical literati to move hither and ventilate their views."

The Bible builds no dramshops, no bagnios, no gambling dens: it builds schools and hospitals and institutions that make for the uplift of all sorts and conditions of men. This is a fact so obvious and universally conceded that it is quite unnecessary to dwell upon it.

FURTHERMORE, the Bible is at the forefront of our industrial life. One day I watched from my study window many thousands of striking handicraftsmen marching by. In that procession I observed a few American flags, a multitude of others inscribed with the shibboleths of socialism, but not a single one that betokened the remotest acquaintance with the industrial ethics set forth in the Book of the Law. Yet these honest toilers—foreign born with scarcely an exception—should be advised of the fact that but for Christ and the Bible there would be no possibility of striking against oppression in our country or anywhere else.

At the beginning of the Christian era the toiler was a bondslave, with no remuneration but his meager "board and keep." Then came the Carpenter of Nazareth with his great manifesto, "The laborer is worthy of his hire!" In the process of the succeeding years the Bible—which was and is that Carpenter's Book—has carried the same manifesto to the limits of the civilized world; so that Christendom today marks the boundaries of the recognized rights of the laboring class.

No doubt there are wrongs to be righted still; but point, if you can, to any land without the Bible where the protest of the employee against the arbitrary rule of the employer is permitted in any form. Could the builders of the pyramids strike against the taskmaster with his whip of scorpions? Are there any strikes in Senegambia or Tierra del Fuego? And why not? Because the sun has not risen upon them. The Carpenter with his Book has been marching down the centuries and urging the square deal of the Golden Rule, so that wherever he has gone capital and labor are beginning to see face to face and eye to eye; but nowhere outside of Christendom is there any such condition of things.

AND further still, the Bible is at the forefront of the world's national life. The reason why we foreigners are here—for we are all foreigners at a greater or less remove—is because we believe America to be the best country the sun ever shone on. It is a refuge for the oppressed of all nations; and they are coming from everywhere. Why do they turn their steps this way? They are fleeing from the lands of a chained Bible to the land of an open Bible! They escape from the oppression of darkness to mingle with a people whom the truth makes free.

The youngest boy in our public schools knows that Columbus discovered America in 1492; but he does not know perhaps that America was not peopled for a hundred years after that. This is a singular and noteworthy fact. What happened in the interim? A tremendous cataclysm that turned the world upside down! A movement for the unchaining of the Book of the Law. It was the Reformation. If Luther had not issued his theses against the papal closing of the Scriptures there would have been—so far as we can see—no scattering of the night. If Holland had not fought for an open Bible the Half Moon would never have sailed this way. If Cromwell and the Roundheads had not championed the right of personal interpretation, the Mayflower and her gallant crew would never have been heard of. The people came, and the people are still coming, because a closed Bible means tyranny and oppression while an open Bible insures life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Our country is a Christian country. It was founded on the principles laid down in the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount; and it has developed along the lines marked out in the Book of the Law. In the year 1777 a strange thing happened. The Revolutionary War had arrested the output of the printing presses and the result was a famine of the Word. Congress was petitioned to relieve the situation; and what did Congress do? It authorized the importation of twenty thousand Bibles from Holland to be distributed among the people. Would our National Legislature go so far in these days? I fear not. But this is what our forefathers thought of the Book of the Law.

FINALLY, the Bible leads the march in international affairs. And now you are pointing across the sea and saying, "Behold the war of Christian nations! Is this the best that an open Bible can show for itself?" Your point is well taken. But Christian nations are no more perfect than Christian men. The inconsistency would be unnoted, were it not for the universal conviction that the prevailing war is not the outcome of loyalty to the Scriptures but in flagrant violation of it.

But there are influences at work that will presently bring this terrible war to an end. What and whence are they? With one consent we say "the principles of justice and humanity and universal concord which are laid down in the Book of the Law." All courts of arbitration are built upon those principles.

Even in the grapple of the nations the Bible forges to the front. I hold in my hand a khaki Testament just received from the firing line. On its fly-leaf are these words: "August 25. I ask you to put your trust in God. He will watch over you and strengthen you. You will find in this little Book guidance when you are in health, comfort when you are in sickness, and strength when you are in adversity." This message is being read by the men in the trenches; and the Gospel which it commends is fast making a reductio ad absurdum of this and every war.

The Bible will be heard from in the Council of the Great Powers which will assemble to determine upon the conditions of peace. An invisible Presence will be there, an overtowering Figure, beside whom kings and kaisers and emperors will dwindle into naught. The last word in that council will be spoken by the divine Man with the Book of the Law. The Prince of Peace must ultimately bring in the truce of God.

LET us therefore have confidence in the Book. When the ark of the covenant was taken by the Philistines at Ebenezer the prosperity of Israel went with it. The old priest Eli sat by the gate awaiting the result of the battle. A messenger came running with his clothes rent and ashes upon his head—"What is there done, my son?"—"Israel is fled before the enemy! There hath been a great slaughter! Thy sons Hophni and Phinehas are slain. The Ark of the Lord is taken!" And it came to pass, when he made mention of the ark, that Eli fell backward and died. Woe in the day when the Bible shall lose its place in the loyal hearts of God's people! But it shall never be. The divine veracity stands pledged to the perpetuity of his Word until it shall accomplish that whereunto he hath sent it.

I have emphasized the fact that the Bible leads the march in every campaign of right and righteousness. The progress of the centuries, as formulated thus far in Christendom, is the outcome of it. The nations that still abide in the night of barbarism are clamoring for the Book. They want "the Western civilization," they want schools and hospitals and constitutional freedom and industrial prosperity; but above everything they want the Bible which guarantees them all.

"Go preach the Word," is the divine call. That done, the rest will follow. For so runs the promise: "As the rain and the snow cometh down from heaven and returneth not thither but watereth the earth and maketh it to bring forth and bud and give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my Word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please and prosper in the thing whereto I send it."

Thus it is written and thus it must be, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

DAILY MEDITATION

Reverend
E. W. Caswell
and
Prof. W. H. T. Dau

Using Other People's Eyes

SUNDAY, October 14. Rom. 12 : 15. "Rejoice with them that do rejoice." There are some wells of water which are not to be found in our own fields. If we want to taste them we shall have to cross into our neighbor's fields. It very commonly happens in life that by going a little farther up the road we shall find treasures of sweet water on another man's estate, which is bountifully offered for our own refreshment. All which symbolism means that some of our rarest joys are to be found hidden in other people's lives, and they have been hidden there in order that we may seek and find one another in spiritual communion. If we just walk about our own fields we shall remain comparatively poor, and our joys will be thin and scanty. The joys of other people are divinely purposed to immeasurably enrich our own.

Whittier, whom I read with increasing delight and profit, said in his old age, "I have learned at last to look at happiness with the eyes of others." That is a great secret, and it is well expressed,—to use other people's eyes, and to look out upon their sunny world. When our own window may, in some seasons, face a clouded, sombre landscape, with much mist and rain, we are purposed to go and look out of another's windows, and see the smiling gardens and fields as they are bathed in the sunshine of God. And we are to do it in the assurance that in Christ Jesus the view from our neighbor's window is as much ours as is the present gloomy view from our own. "All things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas"; and all the things that are found in their varied inheritances.

But let me complete the unfinished passage from Whittier's letter: "I have learned to look at happiness with the eyes of others, and to thank God for the happy unions and holy firesides I have known." Whittier looked at the wedded bliss in the lives of others and shared their joy; he looked at their glowing hearthstones, which were like sacred altars, and he shared the genial fire. He looked at common happiness through the eyes of others, and he lifted his heart in praise to God. He looked for "joy in widest commonalty spread," and he found deep and hallowing satisfaction. And we can all find these rapturous prospects if we are ready to use the eyes of others, and rejoice with them that do rejoice. We shall find the divine blessedness spread out on every side, and in sympathetically looking at it we shall share the gracious bounty. And as we make the glowing altars of others the holy places of our own praise the joy of our neighbor becomes to us the joy of our Lord.

The Great Desire

MONDAY, October 15. Ps. 27 : 4. "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord, to behold his beauty, and to inquire in his temple." Here is the spirit of the true worshiper, who desires never to get out of the presence of God. Interpreting these words in the light of other Psalms, there can be no doubt that to the psalmist the house of the Lord was bounded by no low roof and narrow walls. Not yet had Jesus spoken the Magna Charta of spiritual worship. "Neither in this mountain nor yet in Jerusalem shall men worship God"; yet the psalmist had a great vision of God's omnipresence when he asked, "Whither shall I flee from thy presence?"

The psalmist says he desires but one thing, yet he names three—to dwell in the house of the Lord, to behold his beauty, and to inquire in his temple. Yet all these three desires are one.

A man who lost his fortune in the sudden shrinkage of values during a panic testifies, "While I was wrestling in the dark and attempting to lay anew the foundations of my life, the one thing that kept me from despair, kept me true and clean and hopeful, was the help I got on the Lord's Day in the Lord's house, and from the Word of God. There I learned that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of things which he possesses. There I learned how rich one may be in the treasures of God."

The Real Christ

TUESDAY, October 16. Matt. 22 : 41, 42. "While the Pharisees were gathered together, Jesus asked them, saying, What think ye of Christ? whose son is he? They say unto him, The Son of David." The Pharisees' answer to the question of the Lord strikes one as incomplete. It caused the Lord to follow his first question up with another, which was to draw from them a confession of his deity. Many since then have evaded the crucial question regarding the personality of Christ in a similar manner. The human Christ is admitted by them. They may even extol him as the most wonderful man that ever lived on earth. But if their faith balks at confessing Christ true God, begotten of the Father from eternity, all their admiration of the man Christ is an unprofitable waste of sentiment and words. They deceive themselves if they think that they have embraced the real Christ, and Christ declines their false homage.

The Christ whom many in our day too proclaim is not the Christ of the Scriptures. One is inclined to connect this question of the Lord with the one which precedes it; concerning the great commandment in the law. No matter whether Matthew by relating these questions about the principal point in the law and about the Christ in such close succession intended that we should proceed from the study of the law to the study of him who is "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth," or not, this connection is readily made by any one who knows his New Testament. Now, a true conception of the personality of Christ is necessary for a correct appraisement of his redeeming work. A mere man cannot redeem another (Ps. 49 : 7, 8). In order to take man's place under the law (Gal. 4 : 4, 5), Christ had to be David's son, a true man; but in order to accomplish what no man could accomplish, he had to be at the same time the Son of God.

Forgiveness

WEDNESDAY, October 17. Matt. 6 : 14. "If ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you." The forgiving spirit is one of the tests of Christianity. Hate never forgives; love always does. The heavenly Father cannot forgive those who hold a grudge against another. We must go first and be reconciled, and then come to the altar of prayer.

Guizot wrote in Thiers' album, "The result of my long experience in life is that it is wise to forgive, but never to forget." Thiers added, "A little forgetfulness would not impair the sincerity of forgiveness." Bismarck wrote underneath, "I have been so busy that I have been obliged to forget."

Divine forgiveness remembers our sins no more, but casts them into the depths of the sea of oblivion. Never forgetting in the effort to forgive is no forgiveness at all. It is the external diplomacy of words, not the deep feeling of the heart. God's pardon carries with it his personality and possessions. He would change his truant, traitorous child once more into his own image of love and kindness and make him a member of His family, nestling in His bosom. This must be the soul's ideal if we would be like him.

In This Name We Conquer

By MINNIE LEONA UPTON

GOD of the Nations, beholding and weighing them,
Look in the hearts that we lift to Thy throne.
Cleanse Thou of all that toward self may be swaying them,
Leave in their depths love alone!

God of the Freedom Thou gavest to all of us,
Lo, it is periled—we press to its aid!
Great is our strength, but oh, list to the call of us,
Else it shall powerless be laid!

God of all Chivalry, keep us high-hearted still,
While sister Nations rest faith in our word!
Oft must we sail over waters uncharted still—
Keep thou our vision unblurred!

God of all Battles, our Cause is most glorious—
Make Thou us worthy to shield it from shame!
Guide us still onward, till, fully victorious,
We shall give praise to Thy Name!

Eternal Life

THURSDAY, October 18. Rom. 6 : 22. "But now being made free from sin and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto sanctification, and the end eternal life." The fruit of holiness, that is to say, the end of it, its ultimate destiny, is eternal life. We do not yet know all that life means. It has significations we are yet to learn. And eternal life has meanings into which we can not enter now. Eternal life!—eternal music, eternal art, eternal fellowship, eternal rest, eternal love, eternal satisfaction. How can we know all this while we are yet imprisoned in these fleshly bodies? But the beginnings of these we may know. We can imagine the size of a circle by measuring a small arc of it. We can guess the magnitude of a temple by the depth of its foundations. So, the meaning of eternal life is suggested by some phases of it in the life of him who came to bring immortal life to light.

Jesus lived the eternal life even in the midst of time. Let us look at him in order that we may more clearly see the ultimate outcome of our own life. What vision was his! What serenity! What power! What a surrendered will! What conscious oneness with the Father! What confidence in the future! What contempt for death—or content, which is better! And all this is our destiny! Life eternal calls us, and we are coming.

The Fallen City

FRIDAY, October 19. Zeph. 2 : 15. "This is the rejoicing city that dwelt carelessly, that said in her heart, I am, and there is none beside me: how is she become a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down in! every one that passeth by her shall hiss, and wag his hand." From the connection in which these words occur we infer that the prophet refers to the proud capital, of ancient Assyria, which considers itself impregnable behind its great defenses and incomparable because of its wealth and political power. The Lord, to whom there is nothing more detestable than the pride of self-arrogating men, here expresses his contempt for the boasted might and glory of Nineveh. Travelers and explorers in the Orient have reported the literal fulfilment of Zephaniah's prophecy: the pride of Assyria has become a heap of rubbish with which the winds of the desert play. One of the ancient fathers of the church, while reflecting on the doom pronounced on the old world-empires, has said: "Other vices drive away merely the virtues with which they stand in natural contradiction; wrath drives away patience; drunkenness, soberness; but pride is in no wise satisfied with the extirpation of a single virtue, but arms itself against everything good in the soul, and utterly corrupts it like a pest, so that under its influence every work, although it may be adorned with the appearance of virtue, nevertheless no longer serves God but vain self-glory." An old proverb says: "Pride cometh before a fall." God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. The tower of Babel, this monument to heaven-storming human ambition, is a lesson to all generations, that God can in a twinkling reduce to nothing the labored achievements of unholy zeal for self-aggrandizement.

Christ's March

SATURDAY, October 20. Matt. 2 : 20. "Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt." An angel spoke this message to Joseph in a dream, and an another dream told him when to leave Egypt for the land of Israel. Holman Hunt's "Triumph of the Innocents" pictures the journey to Egypt, accompanied by the spiritual forms of the children murdered by Herod in Bethlehem. Joseph, leading the donkey, is anxiously looking back to see if Mary and the child are riding safely, and if any of Herod's soldiers are on the roadway. Mary does not appear to see the company of the martyred children who are following beside them and floating in the air above them. The child Jesus, delighted with the presence of the little folk, is trying to call his mother's attention to them. The three little ones in advance are strewing flowers and palms in the way. The second group is adorned with flowers, as with beautiful garments, walking beside the foal of the ass. The last ones seem to be just coming down from the heavenly world. In the dim distance of the picture is seen Jacob's ladder and the tree and fountain of life beside the hill.

Truly, this notable religious painting is a picture of the beginning of Christ's triumphal march through time and eternity, leading the children first, and all his followers afterward, to heavenly habitations.

National Sins

ARE we a nation of Sabbath-breakers? Does conscience point at us the finger of accusation because of the desecration of the Sabbath? Do we forget that, all through history, neglect of the Sabbath has been visited upon the desecrators? Few will deny that the Lord's Day has lost much of its old-time reverence among us, and that, to a very large proportion of Americans, it is a day of forgetfulness of all else save pleasure. A reader in Cameron, N. C., sends a timely communication on this subject, evoked as he admits by this journal's advocacy of the movement for a day of national prayer. This is his letter:

> "Let us plead with God unitedly. Let the great and humble join their petitions for National cleansing and keeping. So shall we then be in the right attitude to face the future, for 'Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord.'"
> The above, copied from a recent editorial in the Christian Herald, the great national, undenominational religious weekly, is timely and appropriate. It has provoked the following remarks:
> God's Word tells us that "they that regard iniquity in their hearts, the Lord will not hear." We have come upon a time when we no longer regard God as essential even to our material success in life. We attribute it to our own ingenuity and smartness. There are those among us who laugh when you speak of prayer, and say that all is fixed by the laws of nature; there are others who say that Jesus was not the Son of God but a good and great prophet; and still others who deny the miraculous all through the Bible, and explain it away through some law of nature to their own satisfaction. Some one has said that the scientists have calculated that the part that man plays in the making of crops is only 5 per cent., that the part nature takes is represented by 95 per cent., and that heat and moisture are worth so much to the growth of crops that a pretty small part is left for man, heavy as we may think our work is, and much as we may pat ourselves on the back and say, "Look what I have done!" The conservators of food are calling on us all to "Plant! Plant!" and we may plant and we may sow, but the increase must come from God; and that though we plant every tillable acre, God can, through his dispensation of providence, blast it all, and if he cannot get us on our knees right one way, he will in another. Read Malachi and see what He says through that prophet to the erring ones of old.
> It has occurred to the writer that, as a nation, it would pay us to take stock and see where we are at. We as a nation are violating every week the law of the Sabbath, and it has become a great national sin. We have made too much of that saying of Christ, that the Sabbath was made for man. We have made it mean to be ours to do as we please with, when he doubtless meant it was to be used in as helpful a way spiritually as we could, and to rest the tired body. The thing to do is to cut out the joy-riding and the Sunday train-riding. We could help reduce mightily the labor of the three millions of people who now work on the Lord's day. Our "necessity" is often gauged by our pleasures and comforts, instead of by considering what would be best for the spiritual man. A return to the right way of keeping the Lord's day holy would work wonders all along the line. I saw an advertisement in a daily paper a few days ago, where a great industrial organization was asking for the employment of 500 colored men to work in their plant seven days a week and offering big wages and inducements to live in electrically lit houses, with all the modern conveniences The thought occurred to me that this was an inducement for men to break the Sabbath. We go wild over large projects of this kind, but they cost us more than they come to, in demoralizing our religion. I am of the opinion that we shall have to get rid of some, if not most, of these things, before God will hear our prayers for forgiveness. We shall have to make restitution so far as we can and remove the unclean thing. There is little sense in praying to Him to deliver us from impending trouble and danger, and arising from our knees and rushing back into our idolatrous living.

OUR North Carolina friend's letter has the virtue of plain speech and truthfulness. Sunday labor, travel and pleasuring have transformed the Christian Sabbath with us. It is one of the great charges that may justly be brought against our people, and it has contributed more than any other single cause to the decline of church influence and church attendance. There are other national sins that need also to be confessed, but this is easily one of the foremost. We have set up many idols, and these must be pulled down before we can hope for forgiveness and blessing in answer to our prayers, individual and national.

And, first of all, we must have plain speech in the pulpit, if ever the church hopes to have its spiritual influence revived. In the course of a notable article, in which the present state of religion abroad is discussed, the Rev. Dr. Elmer T. Clark, a leading Methodist minister of St. Louis, laments the indifference to religion in England at this time, when the widespread suffering and bereavement caused by the war might naturally be expected to turn the minds of the people to God. He notes that the church gives no evidence of any increase of spiritual vitality; and although thousands of good people have been made more devout than ever, and while religion now means much more to them than before, the regular services are thinly attended and the formalism seems rather to repel than to attract. He finds, however, no dissatisfaction with religion itself, not even with the doctrines of Christianity. "The man in the street speaks reverently and even fondly of religion, but he criticizes the church unmercifully," he remarks. "Some influential persons pointed out to me that in the war the church had been a source of trouble in England, Ireland, Italy, Russia and Mexico. I immediately took the bull by the horns, and pointed out that in these countries the ecclesiasticism complained of was either a church subsidized by the government or one which claimed political authority. The agreement was instant on their part, and when we came to the discussion of the non-conforming churches, Methodists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Baptists, I found that against them no such antagonism existed."

THIS same writer, after viewing the entire religious situation in the different European countries, finds himself driven to the conclusion that after the war there must be a new church, not a mere office-holding, perfunctory, state-organized, but a real live church, with entire freedom to preach the Gospel. The old yet ever new doctrines of the faith must be restored, if the church would survive. The old faith which teaches the value of the soul, the need of Christian living and the belief in immortality, must be powerfully emphasized. Out of the war there must come, not only to England but to all Europe, a greater church, with a new-born zeal for the world's spiritual needs, a larger conception of God, and a purer faith.

It will be well for us here, where the influence of the war is just beginning to be felt, to profit by the lesson of Europe's condition and get our spiritual house in order in due season. We enjoy a larger religious freedom than Europe, and we have a correspondingly greater responsibility. Here the church is free to preach a whole Gospel. She must vindicate her right to spiritual leadership by doing this fearlessly and faithfully. We need a national cleansing and keeping, the church included. And we should pray and keep on praying, all as with one great voice, until we receive it.

The Joy of Self-Denial

IN these times of universal hardship and suffering, there is a chance for everybody to do something to help lighten the burden of the world. He or she would be a poor American indeed, and a still poorer kind of a Christian, who could not find some opportunity for service. While rich and poor are voluntarily taking up works of helpfulness, neither lack of spirit nor lack of opportunity should be urged as an excuse by the average citizen for not doing what lies within his reach for the general welfare. It is a time of self-denial, and individual character is being tested on this line.

One instance of the kind which shows how the example set by a good man stimulates others, may be related here: The pastor of a church in Chattanooga, Tenn., who was none over too well paid, had been absent on a short preaching tour. While he was away, his congregation met and graciously raised his salary. On his return, he thanked them for their kindness and declined to accept the increase, giving as his reason that the money could be put out to better advantage on special work for the soldiers, in engaging a special missionary for the year, in helping those who would feel the pinch of hunger during the coming winter, and in helping to pay the salary of a missionary pastor in China. Naturally, the spirit of generosity was instantly aroused in that congregation, and now it is a very hive of activity in different lines of Christian helpfulness. This pastor deserves credit for setting a unique example. There is no danger that a congregation so energized will permit him to be the loser by his kindly self-denial.

Duty done is a good thing; well done it is still better; when it is done for His sake who has done so much for us, it is best of all.

We have many instances of splendid self-denial among readers of the Christian Herald. Touched by the distress of others, some have given up very precious keepsakes, long treasured, to be sold and the proceeds used to help some afflicted one. One golden-hearted woman gave an old, worn gold dollar, a little piece of shining metal that had been handled by uncounted possessors in the way of trade, and which now was to be put to the highest of all uses, in His Name. Her gift stirred the spirit of emulation in well-doing, and brought out other hidden treasures which had long lain covered away. There is far more of real sacrifice associated with such gifts than there is in the conspicuously big donation of the affluent. And who shall say that they have not a greater spiritual significance? The widow who cast two mites into the treasury made a greater gift than all the others.

The Press-Gag Law

A PRESS-GAG law has been slipped through Congress, and every newspaper and periodical in the country is now at the mercy of the Postmaster General.

Power is granted to the Post Office Department to exclude from the mails any publication containing any news or comment that may be deemed obnoxious at Washington.

Under such autocratic regulation, true democratic discussion is impossible, and a free press is a thing of the past.

The fact that at least a hundred publications had already been suppressed, without power of law, is startling indication of the wide extent to which suppression may be carried now that there is law for it.

That this law seems counter to the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States appears to be of no consequence. That it is an offense and outrage to every American ideal and instinct appears not to matter.

The Fading Year

TO speak of the autumn as a period of renewing may seem on its face paradoxical. Falling leaves, dried up and withered plants, bare limbs and seared and brown-yellow fields and plains, spell decay and the ruin of summer's beauty and life. The pink, red and bronze tints on leaves and landscape remind one of things that have been; the morning fogs and heavy evening mists, with their peculiar coldish effects, presage snows and wintry blasts. And yet, if we will but look close, we shall find a different aspect. The maple, the horse-chestnut, the linden tree, are already showing next year's buds, whose swelling roots have displaced this year's leaves. Pæony roots, too, are pink with new shoots and all the perennial garden favorites, stokesia, gaillardia, Oriental poppies and sweet-william, have freshly green sprouts under their old and worn-out stems, preparatory to thrusting out for next year's bloom. The oak and sycamore still hold back, but are ready to burst into new glory at short notice. All around us is similar activity. In the fields and gardens the workers are already busy with next year's growths. Now is the time to prepare the land, to dig in the plant foods, to plan for next year's crops; to make cold frames and other provisions for an early harvest. Everywhere it is new work, new hope, new endeavor, pressing on the heels of the old.

The Soldier Boy's Letter

THE brave boys gone to the front or in training in the camps find their lives crowded full of new excitements, new interests, new diversions.

But the homes they have gone from are rather empty because of their going, and lives they have left behind are desolate. A mother's world shrinks strangely with the going out of her boy.

To the soldier boy the old humdrum life at home may now seem tame, compared with the glorious new existence, with its stimulating visions and exalting purposes.

But let the soldier boy remember that war, with all its flare and blare, is, after all, a passing incident. The real abiding life is the home life. The enduring ties are the home ties. There are no visions broader, no purposes higher, no ideals purer than these, in all the world.

It is a worthy lad who, in the excitements and allurements of the new life of the camps, can still hold sacred in his heart his deep debt of love and consolation to the lonely, longing mother and other bereft ones at home.

A letter home is a little thing, perhaps, to the boy in the army. But to the ones remaining at home it is a great, an epochal thing. In many thousands of American homes today the letter from the boy in the army is the supreme message of earth. It is crumpled with many readings and often blurred with tears. It is sustenance to starving hearts.

The boy who is serving his country has other sacred interests to serve as well. However heroic a figure he may cut in camp, he is but half a man who fails in his letters to the folks at home.

Ministerial Veteran Honored

REV. J. H. HAWXHURST of Ocean Grove, New Jersey, ninety years of age, is the oldest member of the New York Methodist Conference, and has the respect and love of a large circle of friends. A delegation of these friends, including Revs. J. W. Marshall, Frank Wilson, A. J. Palmer and J. D. Bills, went to the home of the veteran minister in Ocean Grove recently, and after exchange of greetings on his birthday anniversary, presented him with a purse of $110, which he received with surprise and gratitude. At the meeting of the New Brunswick District preachers, suitable resolutions of appreciation were also passed. "Father" Hawxhurst is singularly preserved in his mental faculties and in his physical strength. Every morning early he takes a long walk on the shore, right against the big ocean, with no island or bay to fence it off from him, and fills his lungs with fresh air. He has a fad of picking up shells from the seashore, writing mottoes on the smooth side, and giving them as souvenirs to his friends. He gave to a friend the other day a shell larger than a man's hand, with the rough yellow of the sand on one side, and a beautiful pinkish purple on the other, on which he had written, up in the joint of the shell, 1917, just under it J. H. Hawxhurst, Ocean Grove, N. J., and farther down is the motto, "Inactivity against rum is a crime." This indicates how live and up to date the old man is. He does not intend that the band wagon shall get away from him, or that he shall be left out of any active war for humanity or God. He is a poet in communing with the ocean, and in picking up the beautiful shells, but he is also a warrior when there is any contest going on against the wrong. Such a cheerful, devout life and honorable record are an honor to age and an inspiration to youth. Such a one can truly say at fourscore and ten, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day." (II Tim. 4 : 7, 8.)

Great Mackerel Fishing

THE most amazing mackerel run ever known on the Pacific Coast drew 10,000 persons to the Redondo Beach Piers, near Los Angeles, recently. On one section of the municipal pier, a few of the thousands of fishermen and women crowded to haul in the greatest catch ever recorded. When news of the big mackerel run spread, thousands began to arrive at the fishing-place. Cots and sleeping-bags dotted the pier. It is claimed that 100,000 of these delicious fish were taken by hook and line in a single day. The mackerel is an ocean fish, and swims in most of the waters of the tropical and temperate zones. They go in large schools and approach the shore in search of smaller fish as food, and for a better place to deposit their eggs. The annual migrations to the coast are pretty regular, though sometimes in certain localities it is hard to tell just what their movements will be. The mackerel is comely in form, beautiful in color and agreeable in flavor. They do not grow large, not usually over three pounds, and are swift as an arrow in the water. In these times, when food conservation is attracting so much attention, it is strange so little mention is made of sea food, of its almost exhaustless supply, and of the ease and rapidity with which fish can be raised. God lavishly provided food for man in the waters that cover three-fourths of the globe, and, if necessary, meat for the race could be supplied from fish. Catching fish in olden times was an important industry, as it is today. Christ selected fishermen to start his church on the earth, simple, rugged, masterful, true men, who left their nets for earthly and heavenly immortality. This is the call to the fishermen: "Come ye after me, and I will make you to become fishers of men." (Mark 1 : 17.)

A Brave Girl Stenographer

AN eighteen-year-old girl the other day put two armed burglars to flight when they sought to take a payroll of $600 from her employer, Reuben Goldstein of Brooklyn. The manufacturer had just returned from the bank to pay off his men when two thieves leaped on him as he entered a hallway. One struck Goldstein on the head with the butt of a pistol, and the other cut his face severely with a knife. The victim was unable to make a successful resistance, when Yetta Weiner suddenly came into the hall and saw the robbers beating her employer. She screamed frantically for help, which did not appear, and then she took a hand in the fight and pluckily attacked the men herself. One ran away at once; the other undertook to follow him, when the girl seized him by the coat with such a tight grip that he slipped out of the coat and left it, rather than himself with her. The girl's continued outcry raised such an alarm that a policeman appeared just in time to trap the coatless burglar on the roof of the factory. The emergency made of Miss Weiner a real heroine, for she took her life in her hand in a scuffle of that kind. It is surprising to see how brave and strong a woman can be when an emergency in life occurs. There were robbers in olden times who knocked their victims down and wounded them severely while they stole from them. Christ makes reference in a parable to one of these robberies, which was more serious than the one in Brooklyn: "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead." (Luke 10 : 30.)

Immense Potato Crop

THIS country has been raising an average crop of 350,000,000 bushels of potatoes a year. This year the farmers and gardeners, spurred on by the plea of President Wilson and the Food Commission, planted a larger acreage than usual, and the year's yield will be 117,000,000 bushels more than the average of the last five years. We consume but 2.6 bushels of potatoes per capita. Germany before the war consumed 9.4 bushels per capita, England 8.3, and France 7.7 bushels. With all our just pride in the great crop of tubers, we are told that we raise fewer potatoes per capita than any nation in the world; that, with the exception of districts like some in Maine and Long Island, the farmers do not use fertilizer enough to insure a large yield. The first outlay for the fertilizer is quite expensive, and few have the ready money, or care to risk so much on the conditions of the crop year. They are wrong, and the expert potato-raisers of Maine and Long Island and other sections are wise in loading the land up with the fertilizer, multiplying the number of hills, and increasing wonderfully the yield. Some potato-farmers who are scientific in their methods, in good years raise almost enough to equal the price of the land. We do not read that the Jews had any potatoes, or any record of them. Their farmers raised wheat and other articles of food. They enriched their fields from the natural fertilizer of the barnyard. The expert potato-raisers of America are those whose seed fell in good ground, thus mentioned by Christ in the parable. "But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some a hundredfold, some sixtyfold, some thirtyfold. Who hath ears to hear let him hear." (Matt. 13 : 8-9.)

100 Miles in 54 Minutes

LOUIS CHEVROLET, driving a Frontenac, won the Harkness $10,000 cup race at Sheepshead Bay Speedway September 22. His time was 54.20.98, an average of 110.44 miles an hour. Ralph De Palma in a Packard finished second and Eddie Hearn in a Duesenberg was third. At the World's Fair in Chicago there was only a hint of the automobile; but the progress of transportation from the old oxcart to the limited train able to go a mile a minute was fully shown. Since that time the automobile has been perfected and the airplane has appeared. What next? Maybe a tube to be shot through from New York to Buffalo, Chicago, or San Francisco. For six thousand years up to twenty-five years ago the world did not know anything swifter on the dirt road than a fast horse. The horse and the antelope were the fleetest things known to the ancient nations. There is this mention of the speed of the Chaldean horses: "Their horses also are swifter than the leopards. . . . they shall fly as the eagle." (Hab. 1 : 8.)

Wholesome Reading for a Soldier for a Whole Year for Only $2.00

A CORRESPONDENT in Paris, France, in a recent dispatch tells us what General Pershing said about reading matter for our boys in France. It applies equally as well to the sailors at sea and to the army in training at home.

"The soldiers in France need all the good, wholesome reading matter the folks at home can send them," Major General Pershing declared.

The American boys at the permanent training camp near the French front have expressed their hunger for fresh newspapers and magazines from home. The question was put up to the American Commander in Chief and he approved plans to furnish the soldiers with good magazines and newspapers.

"I thoroughly approve of the plan of sending plenty of newspapers and magazines to the soldiers," Pershing said. "The idea is excellent. The boys here need any amount of good, wholesome reading matter from the folks at home.

"But one thing must be understood; the officers do not want and the men do not appreciate old papers—old printing. The literature sent to France must be current—that is, new magazines and leading newspapers despatched as soon as possible after publication."

The Witness

By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

Author of "The Voice in the Wilderness"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

STEPHEN MARSHALL, a college freshman, being hazed by the students, was carried to a theater where a very questionable play was on the stage. During the play an alarm of fire was given, and Stephen saved several lives before he fell a victim to the flames. Paul Courtland, a student, was in the theater and witnessed the heroic death of Stephen. He joined in the work of rescue, barely escaped with his life and lay for days in the hospital. When he could walk around he announced to his fellow students that he stood for Stephen Marshall's Christ. The students planned to neutralize this new spirit through the medium of Gila Dare, a worldly young lady, who was to invite Courtland to her house to tell him how she admired his heroic conduct at the fire. Abner Wittemore, who because of his slowness was called "Witless Abner," having received a telegram that his mother was dying, asked Courtland to carry a package of medicine to a poor old woman in whom he was interested. After praying with the old woman the first prayer of his life, Courtland started home, but had not gone far when he saw a boy run over by an automobile. He helped the child into the house, called a doctor, and when the child died made arrangements for a simple funeral, incidentally becoming acquainted with the child's sister, Bonnie Brentwood. The next day he engaged the Rev. John Burns to conduct the funeral in the girl's poor tenement, and after the funeral took the girl, who had collapsed from the strain, to a hospital, where he paid for her care. Then he wrote to Stephen Marshall's mother, whom he had never seen, asking her to take Bonnie Brentwood into her home, and offering to pay her handsomely for her trouble. Mother and Father Marshall were glad to welcome Bonnie as a daughter to take Stephen's place.

FATHER'S face kindled with interest as the letter went on with its proposition, but he shook his head when it came to the money part, interrupting her:

"I don't like that idea, mother; we don't keep boarders, and we're plenty able to invite company for as long as we like. Besides, it don't seem just the right thing for that young feller to be paying her board. She wouldn't like it if she knew it. If she was our daughter we wouldn't want her to be put in that position, though it's very kind of him of course—"

"Of course!" said Mother, breathlessly. "He couldn't very well ask us, you know, without saying something like that, especially as he doesn't know us, except by hearsay, at all."

"Of course," agreed Father; "but then equally of course we won't let it stand that way. You can send that young feller back his check, and tell him to get his new ottymobeel. He won't be young but once, and I reckon a young feller of that kind won't get any harm from his ottymobeels, no matter how many he has of 'em. Tell him we'll take care of the money part. Tell him we're glad to get a daughter. You're sure, Mother, it won't be too much for you to have a stranger around in Steve's place?"

"No, I like it," said Mother, with a smile. "Do you know, Father, what I've been thinking? I thought, suppose that girl was the one Stephen would have loved and wanted to marry if he had lived. And suppose he had brought her home here, what a fuss we would have made about her, and all! And I'd just have loved to fix up the house and make it look pleasant for her and love her as if she were my own daughter."

Father's eyes were moist, too. "H'm! Yes!" he said, trying to clear his throat. "I guess she'd be comp'ny for you, too, Mother, when I have to go to town, and she'd help around with the work some when she got better."

"I've been thinking," said Mother. "I've always thought I'd like to fix up the spare room. I read in my magazine how to fix up a young girl's room when she comes home from college. You paint the furniture white, and have two sets of curtains, pink and white, and little shelves for her books. Do you think we could do it?"

"Why, sure!" said Father. He was so pleased to see Mother interested like this that he was fairly trembling. She had been so still and quiet and wistful ever since the news came about Stephen. "Why, sure! Get some pretty wallpaper, too, while you're 'bout it. S'posin' you and I take a run to town again in the morning and pick it out. Then you can pick your curtains and paint, too, and get Jed Lewis to come in the afternoon and put on the first coat."

MOTHER'S eyes glistened.

"Come to think of it, hadn't you better send a telegram to that chap tonight? You know we can 'phone it down to the town office. He'll maybe be worried how you're going to take that letter."

It took nearly an hour to reduce the telegram to ten words, but at last they settled on:

Bonnie welcome. Am writing you both tonight. No money necessary.
(Signed)
STEPHEN'S MOTHER AND FATHER.

Then came the letter to Bonnie, written in a cramped, laborious hand:

DEAR LITTLE GIRL: You don't know me, but I've heard about you from a sort of neighbor of yours. I'm just a lonely mother whose only son has gone home to heaven. I've heard all about your sorrow and loneliness, and I've taken a notion that maybe you would like to come and visit me for a little while and help cheer me up.

Father and I are fixing up your room for you, just as we would if you were our own daughter coming home from college. We are sending you mileage, and a check to get any little things you may need for the journey, because, of course, we wouldn't want to put you to expense to come all this long way just to please two lonely old people.

Don't wait to get any fixings. Just come as you are. We're plain folks.

Father says be sure you get a good, comfortable berth in the sleeper, and have your trunk checked right through.

Please send a telegram as soon as you get this, saying when the doctor will let you come, and don't disappoint us for anything.

Lovingly your friend,
RACHEL MARSHALL.

The letter to Courtland was more brief, but just as expressive.

MR. PAUL COURTLAND:
DEAR FRIEND—You're a dear boy and I'm proud that my son had you for a friend.

(When Courtland read that letter he winced at that sentence and saw himself once more standing in the hall in front of Stephen Marshall's room, holding the garments of those who persecuted him.)

I have written Bonnie Brentwood, telling her how much we want her, and I am going to town in the morning to get some things to fix up a pretty room for her. I thank you for thinking I was a good mother. Father and I are both quite proud about it. We are very lonely and are glad to have a daughter for as long as she will stay. But, anyway, if we hadn't wanted her, we could not have said no when you asked for Christ's sake. Father says we are returning the check because we want to do this for Bonnie ourselves; then there won't be anything to cover up. Father says if you have begun this way you will find plenty of ways to spend that money for Christ and let us look after this one little girl. We've sent her mileage and some money, and we're going to try to make her happy. And some day we would be very happy if you would come out and visit us. I should like to know you for my dear Stephen's sake. You are a dear boy, and I want to know you better. I am glad you have found our Christ. Father thinks so too. Thank you for thinking I would understand.

Lovingly,
MOTHER MARSHALL.

BUT after all that excitement Mother Marshall could not sleep. She lay quietly beside Father in the old four-poster and planned all about that room. She must get Sam Carpenter to put in some little shelves each side of the windows, and a wide locker between for a window-seat, and she would make some pillows like those in the magazine pictures.

Once she stirred restlessly, and Father put out his hand and touched her in alarm:

"What's the matter, Rachel? Aren't you sleeping?"

"Father, I believe we'll have to get a new rug for that room."

"Sure!" said Father, relaxing sleepily.

"Gray with pink rosebuds, soft and thick," she whispered.

"Sure! pink with gray rosebuds," murmured Father as he dropped off again.

They made very little of breakfast the next morning; they were both too excited about getting off early.

It was not until they were on their way back home again, with packages all about their feet, and an eager light in their faces, that an idea suddenly came to both of them—an idea so chilling that the eagerness went out of their eyes for a moment, and the old, patient, sweet look of sorrow came back. It was Mother Marshall who put it into words:

"You don't suppose, Seth," she appealed, "that perhaps she mightn't want to come, after all!"

"Well, I was thinking, Rachel," he said, tenderly, "we'd best not be getting too set on it. But, anyhow, we'd be ready. You know Stevie always wanted you to have things fixed nice and fancy. But you fix it up. I guess she's coming. I really do think she must be coming! We'll just pray about it and then we'll leave it there!"

Father lifted out the big roll of soft, velvety carpeting, gray as a cloud, with moss roses scattered over it. This "Bonnie" girl! If she would only come, what a bright, happy thng it would be in their desolated home!

But suppose she shouldn't come?

CHAPTER XI

THE telegram reached Courtland Friday evening, just as he was going to the Dare dinner, and filled him with an almost childish delight. To think there had really been a woman in the world who would respond in that cordial way to a call from the great unknown!

He presented himself in his most sparkling mood at the house where he was to dine. Gila looked and drooped her eyes demurely. She thought the sparkle was all for her, and her little wicked heart gave a throb of exultant joy.

Mrs. Dare was no longer a large, purple person. She was in full evening dress, what there was of it, black gauze emblazoned with dartling sequins of deep blue. An aigrette in her hair twinkled above her coarse, painted face. Courtland, as he studied her more closely, rejoiced that the telegram had arrived before he left the dormitory, for he never could have had the courage to come to this plump-shouldered lady seeking refuge for his refined little Bonnie girl.

The father of the family was a little wisp of a man with a nervous laugh and a high, thin voice. There were kind lines around his mouth, but there was a weakness about the face that showed he was ruled by others to a large extent. There was a cunning look in his eye that might explain the general impression current that he knew how to turn a dollar to his own account.

GILA was all in white, from the tip of her pearly shoulders down to the tip of her pearl-beaded slippers—white and demure. Her skin looked even more pearly than when she wore the brilliant red-velvet gown. It had a pure dazzling whiteness, different from most skins. It perplexed him. And in contrast the great dark eyes, lifted pansy-like for an instant and then down-drooped beneath those wonderful, long, curling lashes, were almost startling in their beauty. The hair was simply arranged with a plain narrow band of black velvet around the white temples, and the soft loops of cloudy darkness drawn out on her cheeks in her own fantastic way.

But he only looked at her admiringly, and talked on about the college games, making himself agreeable to every one, and winning more and more the lifted pansy-eyes.

When dinner was over they drifted informally into a large white-and-gold reception-room, Gila, in her soft transparencies, looked like a wraith amid it all. The young man chose to think she was too rare and fine for a place so ornate.

Presently the mother was enfolded in a gorgeous blue-plush evening cloak beloaded with handsome black fur; and with many bows and kindly words, the little husband toddled off beside her to the opera.

Gila shyly asked Courtland if he would like to go to the library, where it was cozier. The red light glowed across the hall, and he turned from it with a shudder of remembrance. The glow seemed to beat upon his nerves like something striking his eyeballs.

"I'd like to hear you play, if you will," he answered.

Gila pouted. She did not want to play, but she would not seem to refuse the challenge. She went to the piano and rippled off a brilliant waltz or two, and then, whirling on the gilded stool, she lifted her big eyes to him:

"I don't like it in here," she said; "let's go into the library by the fire. It's pleasanter there to talk."

COURTLAND hesitated. "Look here," said he, frankly. "Wouldn't you just as soon sit somewhere else? I don't like that red light of yours. It gets on my nerves. I don't like to see you in it. It makes you look—well—something different from what I believe you really are. I like a plain, honest white light."

Gila gave him one swift, wondering glance and walked laughingly over to the library door. "Oh, is that all?" she said, and, touching a button, she switched off the light in the big red table-lamp and switched on what seemed like a thousand little tapers concealed softly about the ceiling.

"There!" she cried, half mockingly. "You can have as much light as you like, and when you get tired of that we can cut them all off and sit in the firelight." She touched another button and let him see the room in the soft dim shadows and rich glow of the fire. Then she turned the full light on again and entered the room, dropping into one big leather chair at the side of the fireplace and indicating another on the opposite side. She had read him aright. Hers was the demure part, the reserved, shy maiden, the innocent, child-like, womanly woman. She would play it.

Well pleased, with a sigh of relief he dropped into the chair and sat watching her, talking idly, as one who is feeling his way to a pleasant intimacy of whose nature he is not quite sure. He studied her, thinking what a friend she might be to that other poor girl in her loneliness and sorrow, if she only would. He didn't know that he was yielding again to the lure. He only knew that it was a pleasure to talk to her, to be near her, to feel her sympathy.

"May I shut off the bright light and sit in the firelight?" he asked suddenly, and Gila acquiesced sweetly.

"I want to tell you about a girl I have met this week," he said.

A CHILL fell upon Gila, but she did not show it. she never even flickered those long lashes. Another girl! How dared he!

"Yes?" The inflection, the whole attitude, was perfect. He plunged ahead.

"You are so very wonderful yourself that I am sure you will appreciate and understand her, and I think you are just the friend she needs."

Gila stiffened in her chair and turned her face nicely to the glow of the fire, so he could just see her lovely profile.

"She is all alone in the city—"

"Oh!" broke forth Gila in almost childish dismay. "Not even a chaperon?"

Courtland stopped, bewildered. Then he laughed indulgently. "She didn't have any use for a chaperon. She came here with her little brother to earn their living."

"Oh, she had a brother, then!" sighed Gila with evident relief.

It occurred to Courtland to be a bit pleased that Gila was so particular

YOU, yourself, can easily keep your furniture, woodwork, linoleum and floors, in perfect condition with Johnson's Prepared Wax. It cleans and polishes in one operation — protects and preserves varnish, adding years to its life—covers up mars and small surface scratches—and prevents checking.

A Dust-Proof Furniture Polish

Polish all your furniture—including the piano—with Johnson's Prepared Wax. You will be surprised at the wonderful improvement. It imparts a hard, dry, glassiike polish of great beauty and durability. Johnson's Prepared Wax will quickly and permanently remove that bluish, cloudy appearance from your piano, victrola and mahogany furniture.

JOHNSON'S
Liquid and Paste
PREPARED WAX

Johnson's Prepared Wax is now made in Liquid Form as well as Paste. Many people prefer the Liquid Wax as it polishes instantly with but very little rubbing—you can go over a roomful of furniture, a good sized floor, or an automobile in half-an-hour.

Johnson's Liquid Prepared Wax is exactly the same as the Paste Wax except that it is a liquid. It contains absolutely no oil, consequently does not collect or hold the dust. It never becomes soft or sticky in the hottest weather or from the heat of the body.

For Floors and Linoleums

Johnson's Liquid Prepared Wax gives just the polish and protection you need on your linoleums. It imparts a beautiful, dry polish which any housewife can easily keep in perfect condition, by simply wiping up the dust occasionally with a dry cloth. It brings out the pattern of the linoleum and preserves it.

Johnson's Prepared Wax is just as necessary around the house as soap. Keep it always on hand for polishing your about the conventionalities. He had heard it rumored more than once that her own conduct overstepped the most lenient of rules. That must have been a mistake. But he explained, gently:

"The little brother was killed on Monday night," he said, gravely. "Just run down in cold blood by a passing automobile."

"How perfectly dreadful!" shuddered Gila, shrinking back into the depths of the chair. "But you know you mustn't believe a story like that! Poor people are always getting up such tales about rich people's automobiles. The children just run out and get in the way of the cars. I've seen them myself. I don't suppose the child was run over. It was probably his own fault."

"Yes, he was run over," said Courtland, gently. "I saw it myself! I was standing on the curbstone when the boy—he was a beautiful little fellow with long golden curls—rushed out to meet his sister, and the automobile came whirring by without a sign of a horn, and crushed him down just like a broken lily.

Gila was still for a minute. "Oh, well," she said, "I suppose he is better off and the girl is, too. How could she take care of a child in the city alone, and do any work? Besides, children are an awful torment. What did you want me to do for her? Get her a position as a maid?"

THERE was something almost flippant in her tone. Strange that Courtland did not recognize it. But the firelight, the white gown, the pure profile, the down-drooped lashes, had done for him once more what the red light had done before—taken him out of his normal senses and made him see a Gila that was not really there, soft, sweet, tender, womanly. The words, though they did not satisfy him, merely meant that she had not yet understood.

"No," he said, gently. "I want you to go and see her. She is sick and in the hospital. She needs a friend, a real girl friend, such as you could be if you would."

Gila answered in her slow, pretty drawl. "Why, I hate hospitals! I wouldn't even go to see mamma when she was there. But I'll go if you want me to. Of course, I won't promise how much good I'll do. Girls of that stamp don't want to be helped, you know. But I'll see what I can do. I don't mind giving her something. I've three evening dresses, that I perfectly hate, and one of them I've never had on but once. She might get a position to act somewhere, or sing in a café if she had good clothes."

Courtland hastened to explain that Miss Brentwood was a refined girl of good family, and that it would be an insult to offer her second-hand clothing; but when he gave it up and yielded to Gila's plea that he drop these horrid, gloomy subjects and talk about something cheerful, he had a feeling of failure. Perhaps he ought not to have told Gila, after all.

If he could have seen Gila a couple of hours later, standing before her mirror again and setting those little sharp teeth into her red lip, the ugly frown between her angry eyes; if he could have heard her low-muttered words, and, worse still, guessed her thoughts about himself and that other girl—he certainly would have taken strenuous measures to prevent that visit.

Drumming Booze Out of the Camps

Progress of the Campaign Begun by the United Committee on War Temperance

THE campaign to "Drum Booze out of Training Camps" which was set forth by the Christian Herald in the issue of September 12 has made rapid progress within the past few weeks. Financial support is coming in increasing amount from Young People's Societies, from churches, and especially from individuals. Loyal citizens in all parts of the country are showing that they intend that our troops shall be fortified against booze as well as bullets, against gin as well as guns.

Harley H. Gill, executive secretary of the United Committee on War Temperance Activities in the Army and Navy, with offices at 289 Fourth Avenue, New York, has announced that the campaign will go forward in time, if the financial response of the past weeks continues. The appeal is made in behalf of morality, of military efficiency, of personal welfare and of loyalty to the nation.

Vance Thompson has written a great article entitled "Dolled-up Booze," a million copies of which it is proposed to give to the men in all the camps, to warn them against the dangers of wine. The Manual which is to be given to the soldiers has been submitted to medical and military experts, and has been pronounced to be one of the best things ever put out. Seven stereomotographs—the new and wonderful picture machine—have been ordered for immediate service—one to be sent to France, and the other six to make a circuit of the forts and small training camps, stopping at each one several days and giving every man a chance to see the finest slides ever prepared on the temperance question. Soon twenty-five more of these machines will be put out, so that there will be one in every great cantonment and encampment.

The whirlwind speaking campaign opened with Dr. Daniel A. Poling, associate president of the World's Christian Endeavor Society, in three big meetings at Newport. Mr. Poling holds the earnest attention of the men with his appeal for "clean hands and clean lives, given without rancor for a clean cause."

The committee has also arranged to have one-minute moving picture films shown in the camps once a week, with the regular film entertainments.

As the days pass, the accounts of drunkenness among soldiers and sailors confirm, in a saddening way, the need of fortifying our fighters against alcohol. In spite of earnest officials, in many places, the booze-sellers persist in violating the law against selling liquor to soldiers.

The means of getting the liquor are varied. In some places, citizens' suits are rented to soldiers and sailors for a long enough time to enable them to get drunk. In scores of instances, accounts of which the United Committee on War Temperance has on file, Secretary Gill states the men in uniform got messenger boys, porters, barbers, and others to procure the liquor for them.

One affidavit, out of many in the hands of the committee, sets forth that the declarant on September 17, in company with another witness, visited a "refreshment parlor" at Coney Island at 9:25 P. M., and saw two sailors in a party of six, of which three were girls. The girls and the third man ordered beer and other intoxicating drinks and the sailors ordered so-called soft drinks and exchanged with the other members of the party for the intoxicating liquors."

In France conditions are even worse. The following is taken from a letter of a Y. M. C. A. man in France. Paris is a beautiful city but is a hotbed of vice. Here you find soldiers of all nations, which may account for it, but the place is rotten. Vice is open and unchecked. You are solicited at every corner; every one you meet offers you cigarettes, and you can't sit down but they presume that you want beer. Believe me, it takes all the stuff a man's got in him to keep straight in this town."

These things help us to see how necessary it is to carry on a thoroughly effective temperance campaign in all the camps, and to extend the work in France, where already many thousands of our men are in training.

All contributions in aid of the temperance work in the Army should be addressed "Army Temperance Work," Christian Herald, Bible House, New York. Every gift for the advancement of this deserving cause will be acknowledged.

Temple Rebuilt and Dedicated

International Sunday School Lesson for October 21

Ezra 3:8-13; 6:14-18

The Primacy of Worship

By Rev. George D. Allison

THE account in Ezra of the restoration of the Jewish people puts religion in the first place. Their chief concern was the re-establishment of the worship of Jehovah. This is beautifully exemplified in this third chapter, where they set up the great rough altar before the plans of the temple are drawn. Ezra seems to teach something very like this: before the state, the temple; before the temple, the altar; before the altar, loyal hearts.

Yet those grateful hearts needed the ministry of that altar on the top of Mount Moriah, the highest point, where toilers of the market-place and field could catch a glimpse of inspiration and breathe a prayer. That humbled nation, poor though it was, needed the outward expression of its faith in a temple where its ideals and aspirations could find social expression. Where sincerity and reverence are found, they soon result in institutions and forms for the maintenance and spread of the knowledge of God. Every age of revived faith has been an age of church-building and of religious literature.

Laying Foundations

Like every great undertaking, this called for much laborious preliminary work. It is necessary to clear the ground of rubbish before laying one stone upon another. It is necessary to dig a hole before one can rear a spire. The foundation-builders do not always receive the credit that they get here in Ezra. But in God's book of records they are never forgotten. Whether they labor under ground on material shrines or unostentatiously lay the spiritual foundations of teaching little children the fundamental truths about God and his kingdom, their names are written in the Lamb's Book of Life.

From the beginning the new house of worship on Zion was well superintended. The ablest men in the Jewish community thought it worthy of their best time and thought. And we to-day, in our tremendous task of reconstituting all life, national and individual, on the basis of the doctrines of Jesus, need to enlist the cooperation of the biggest men, the finest brains and the largest gifts in the founding of the kingdom on earth. We cannot do our fullest work without our ablest leaders.

Church Architecture

Thanks to the Bible descriptions and the work of students of archeology, we have now a fairly accurate conception of what this temple looked like. It seems to have been well adapted to its declared purposes; an elaborate ritual, numerous sacrifices, a national rallying point in time of trouble. Are our Christian churches as well adapted to their different purposes--religious education of the young, the spoken message of prophecy to the congregation, the inspiration of every form of good work?

Well, I have been in churches where you cannot hear and in pews where you cannot even see. I have been where there were two hundred children of all ages in one room to be taught a variety of lessons (result: a bedlam worse than an olden Chinese school). I have been where the architect never consulted the minister and never heard of the Sunday school superintendent!

Which pleases God most, do you suppose –a gorgeous altar like that just dedicated in St. Louis, described as "an emperor's tribute to God," or a bright, simple hall where all can hear the Word, surrounded by separate class-rooms where Christ's little ones receive their appropriate spiritual nourishment in due season? The Jews builded wisely—for their time. We must build as wisely for ours.

When the trumpets sounded and the choir sang, a great shout went up from the congregation. But mingled with cries of joy was the weeping of those who remembered the former house. How natural and yet how pathetic! The young looked forward to the new Jerusalem, while the old looked back through the glamour of memory to the old. Surely these "ancient" men had a right to pay a tribute to the past; but one can only hope that they soon joined in the prayer for the days to come.

All churches are handicapped by those who look back. They tell of the good old days, of the saints now gone, of the Christian Endeavor Society "back home," of the preaching they heard years agone. They forget that the Kingdom is always coming: "Behold, a new thing will I do, saith the Lord." It is too bad to be pessimistic with a hard job of building ahead. It is unwise to draw odious comparisons between what our fathers did and the tasks we must do. We should only look back for inspiration; and when we put our hands to the plow, the inspiration is ahead.

But every new step is a solemn as well as a joyous thing, be it a new church, a graduation from school, or the revision of a cherished belief to a closer approximation to eternal truth.

The Heart-Saddening Delays

After celebrating the foundations so zealously, reverses came. Jealous enemies petitioned the king and blocked the enterprise for fifteen long, weary years. But they never abadoned the enterprise. If the granite columns did not rise, the daily sacrifice of the altar and the unseen incense of prayer ascended. They never forgot the work.

The great cathedral is more than "forty and six years" in building. Even the little country church is never completed when the eager zealous ones hoped to put it to good use. And how much more is this the case with spiritual temples! France hailed liberty, equality, and fraternity in 1789, but it took more than a century to found the republic surely. We greeted the emancipation of Russia with a shout, but it will be a long while before an educated, free nation rises upon the foundations that persecuted heroes laid in the dark.

Again and again the enthusiastic think that the kingdom of God has fully come, but war or vice or irreligion intervenes and the time is not yet. Nevertheless we must never cease from building day by day.

When Gladstone's Home Rule Bill was finally rejected in the House of Lords, the Great Commoner said, "For years I have been rolling this stone up the hill and now it has been cast to the bottom again." But he started immediately to roll it up once more. The perseverance of the saints is a signal witness to the grace of God in their hearts.

Diverse Kingly Points of View

Artaxerxes refused to let the returned exiles complete their building lest they should become too powerful for him to control. Darius, succeeding to the throne, gladly allows them to resume work, to ensure their loyalty and cement their attachment to his rule. There are two typical ways of looking at government, and, for that matter, at religion. One seeks to keep the people down, to limit them, suppress their aspirations. Its watchword is "dominate." The other seeks to raise the people up, to cultivate their abilities, to increase their liberties. Its watchword is "uplift."

We face the same alternative in our Christianity, in our several denominations. Some churches are afraid of their people, seek to circumscribe their activities, keep them ignorant, cramp their minds. Others believe that truth is mighty and will prevail, so they welcome criticism and research, encourage

Protecting your brakes against a rainy day

Facts about a discovery that overcomes one of the most dangerous conditions of motoring

Have you noticed in your car's brakes any tendency to slip and grab on a rainy day?

This indicates inability of the brake lining to resist moisture — one of the most dangerous defects it can possess.

For moisture—not only rain, but water from any source, as well as oil, gasoline, etc.—causes the lining to become swollen and "mushy," which makes it slip and grab. Automobile accidents due to failure of the brakes can, in almost every case, be traced directly to this cause.

The discovery of Grapnal

This problem of moisture was considered at the very start in the development of Thermoid Brake Lining. Hundreds of experiments were made in the Thermoid laboratories, which resulted in the discovery of a remarkable new chemical substance now known as Grapnal.

Thermoid Brake Lining is thoroughly impregnated with Grapnal by a special process. As a result, it is made practically impervious to moisture even under the most severe conditions. A series of impartial tests, conducted by a well known chemist, which included all well known brands, proved beyond question the remarkable superiority of Thermoid Brake Lining.

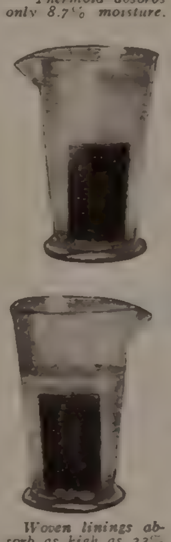
Thermoid absorbs only 8.7% moisture.



Woven linings absorb as high as 23% moisture.

Two other exclusive features

Grapnal is an exclusive Thermoid formula and is used in no other brake lining. In addition Thermoid possesses two other exclusive features in its process of manufacture:

1. It has over 40% more material by actual weight.
   This means longer service—best service. Thermoid is over 40% heavier than any woven brake lining. This is why it is better fitted to stand the responsibilities placed on it.
2. It is hydraulic compressed.
   Powerful hydraulic presses compress Thermoid into a solid mass. This makes it far tougher and stronger than loosely woven linings, not hydraulic compressed. It makes wearing surface ideal for braking; it can't grab and it can't slip. The "coefficient of friction" is just right.

Specify Thermoid

When you reline your brakes, use the brake lining the experts specify — Thermoid. Leading jobbers, garages, and dealers stock Thermoid and recommend it. When you buy a new car insist that the Brake Lining is Thermoid.

Remember your life depends on the efficiency of your brakes, and the efficiency of your brakes depends on your brake lining. Be sure your brakes are lined with Thermoid Brake Lining. The cost is a little more—and well worth it.

Our guarantee

Thermoid will make good—or WE WILL. It is positively guaranteed to out-wear, and give better satisfaction than any other brake lining.

Lift Corns out with Fingers

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns or calluses so they peel off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a tender, aching corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

Women! Keep a tiny bottle of Freezone on your dresser and never let a corn ache twice.

Small bottles can be had at any drug store in the United States or Canada.

liberty of conscience, and permit a wide diversity of opinions without fear. The former become autocratic, stagnant, formal. The latter become democratic, progressive and vital.

The Help of Haggai and Zechariah

Two writers of Bible books are mentioned in our lesson. Many Bible readers could not place these books historically or tell their messages. Be sure to take the time right now to see how plainly they fit in here. If you teach this quarter's lessons well, your boys and girls will never forget Ezra and Nehemiah and the Return from Exile. If you are careful they will know that Haggai and Zechariah refer to the Rebuilding of the Temple. Thus they will have taken further steps toward becoming workmen that need not be ashamed, "rightly dividing" the word of truth.

Haggai was the older man and was the chief force in urging that rebuilding start. "Is it a time for you yourselves to dwell in your ceiled houses while This House lieth waste?" was the burden of his challenge. "I am with you, saith Jehovah," was his continual reassurance. This caustic orator declared that a man who gave nothing to the Lord was earning wages and putting them into a bag with holes! To the pessimistic old-timers he declared, "Who is left among you that saw this house in its former glory? and how do ye see it now? . . . The latter glory of this house shall be greater than the former, saith the Lord of hosts."

The Man Among the Myrtles

Zechariah carried on Haggai's work during the long delay. He used to go out into the Valley of Kedron and spend the night under the myrtle trees in prayer and meditation. Returning, he would bring his messages of encouragement and hope in the form of strange prophetic visions. Angel horsemen are on the watch for signs of change and hope. The man with the measuring line is to be told that Jerusalem shall be larger than he dreams and Jehovah its bulwark of defense. The governor Zerubbabel and the high priest Jeshua are exalted together, the whole nation is a church.

Zechariah has given us watchwords of rare meaning;

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith Jehovah of hosts."

"Who hath despised the day of small things?"

"Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain."

Success at Last

The diligence of the leaders, the encouragement of ringing prophecy and the loyalty of the common people resulted at last in the completion of a new temple where Solomon's had stood. The friendly cooperation of the Persian satrap is cheerfully acknowledged, but it was the indomitable devotion of the returned exiles that had won. They certainly were entitled to keep the dedication with great joy. Their joy took the form of greater sacrifices, new offerings, redoubled allegiance.

The redeemed nation rallied around that altar. The twelve goats of the sin-offering were for all twelve tribes; no longer divided into North and South, no longer half idolaters and half worshipers of Jehovah, no longer under punishment, but with a sense of pardon and restoration. No wonder Zechariah believed that the "brand plucked out of the fire" had been miraculously transformed into "a candlestick all of gold."

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN,

Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

Go-to-Sunday-School Day, November 4

ONE hundred and seventy thousand Sunday schools in the United States and Canada will be called upon by the International Sunday School Association to observe November 4 as a great "Go-to-Sunday-School Day."

The purpose of this day is:

1. To secure new members for the Sunday school, for Cradle Roll, Home Department, or any other department.
2. To let the community know by proper advertising what the Sunday school stands for as a school for all ages.
3. To secure all the church membership for some department of the school-life.
4. To show up the Sunday school as a community force for temperance, and such service as Testament-giving for soldiers, Red Cross cooperation, food conservation, and also as a link to bind up the soldiers who are school members to good influences. One school has a plan to attach each of its soldiers to a school correspondent.
5. To emphasize the Sunday school as a world-force, and as a binding factor between the nations through its 300,000 Sunday schools and its three million Sunday school teachers and thirty-five million members.

In order to make the most of "Go-to-Sunday-School Day" it is planned to prepare for and follow up the day. It is proposed, therefore, to observe the following special days in this connection:

1. October 21. "Get-Ready Sunday."

On this day the school should see that there are the proper classes or departments for those who are to be invited to join on "Go-to-Sunday-School Day." The weak places should be mended, the school-room decorated with proper pictures and mottoes, and a wholesome atmosphere given to the building. A Welcome Committee should be appointed.

2. October 28. "Every-Member-Present Sunday."

Some call this a "Round-Up Sunday," when an effort is made all along the line to locate, by visitation or correspondence, every scholar and see that that scholar is out on this day. The percentage of each class should be announced. All members who have removed, or whose attendance is absolutely hopeless, should be cleaned from the roll. Every member should be urged to enter a doubling-up effort for the following Sunday, and to secure at least one member for some class or department.

3. November 4. "Go-to-Sunday-School Day."

New members should stand and be introduced to the school, and the school plans should be announced to visitors and an effort made to enroll all of those present—as permanent school members.

4. "Forward-Step Day."

November is a good time to bring scholars face to face with the question of decision for Christ. During the week previous, the teachers should meet for prayer and conference with this in view. Personal letters should be sent to unconverted scholars. On this Sunday the claims of Christ should be urged by pastor, superintendent and teacher, and decisions secured. Those who are Christians should indicate in writing some new forward step in service which they will take.

5. November 18. "Join-the-Church Sunday."

It is good to make this a special church-joining day for the young people and their parents. The pastor can be a real power in perfecting the plans of the day through his message in the church-services on the Sundays included in the effort.

The Reformation-Centennial and the War

IT is often asked whether the fact that America is at war with the land of Luther will interefere with the quadricentennial celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Reformation, commonly dated from October 31, 1517, when Martin Luther nailed his ninety-five theses on the door of the Wittenberg church. And it is asked also whether the war should interfere with such a celebration. Surely both questions should be answered in a very decided negative.

As American Protestants, loyal to America and loyal to Protestantism, we should at this time face these questions candidly and intelligently. If we are not able to face them intelligently, then they should be given.

There are unquestionably elements of danger in the present situation to our common Protestantism. A well-known, widely honored, Evangelical Nonconformist leader of England recently wrote to an American friend that he doubted whether England would give much attention to the Reformation quadricentennial and that many Protestants in England are beginning to doubt whether, after all, the fruits of the Reformation were as beneficent as we have believed them to be. The inference was that this was his own view. That is a position dangerous to Protestantism certainly. Similar statements are beginning to be made in America.

Roman Catholics are endeavoring to take advantage of this situation. We should expect that, and Catholics are within their rights when they seek to take advantage of it. Surely we cannot blame them. They are seeking to make it appear that Luther and Germany were wholly responsible for the Reformation and for all its attendant alleged evils from Luther's time to the present great war. Catholic literature attacking the teachings of Luther and Protestantism is being widely circulated. This literature is making an impression, it is claimed, in non-Catholic circles, largely due to the war.

While we concede the right of Catholics to make such a campaign, the right and duty of Protestants are very plain.

THE war with Germany is simply an added reason for studying the Reformation in all its phases. Was Luther fundamentally wrong? Then our common Protestantism is fundamentally wrong. If Luther was wrong, then Calvin and Zwingli and Cranmer and Knox were wrong. All these men and others share the credit or the blame for the movement we call the Reformation. Much as we owe to them and to the reformers before the Reformation, like Wycliffe, Huss and Savonarola, yet it should not be lost sight of that it was Luther and his earlier teachings which furnished the starting-point of this great religious movement. To Luther belongs the primary responsibility. Catholics are right about that, anyway.

The fact that we are at war with Luther's country should make a study of the Reformation all the more interesting to us. Are Catholics right who are telling us that the great evil of this war is due chiefly to the divisive elements introduced into modern religion and politics by Luther? Or is it true on the other hand that those nations, both Catholic and Protestant, which are fighting Luther's country and its allies are fighting for those principles of modern liberty which we have been taught to believe have so many of their roots in the Reformation?

These are interesting questions surely. If we haven't satisfactory answers to them in the bewilderment of this war, we should seek to find such answers.

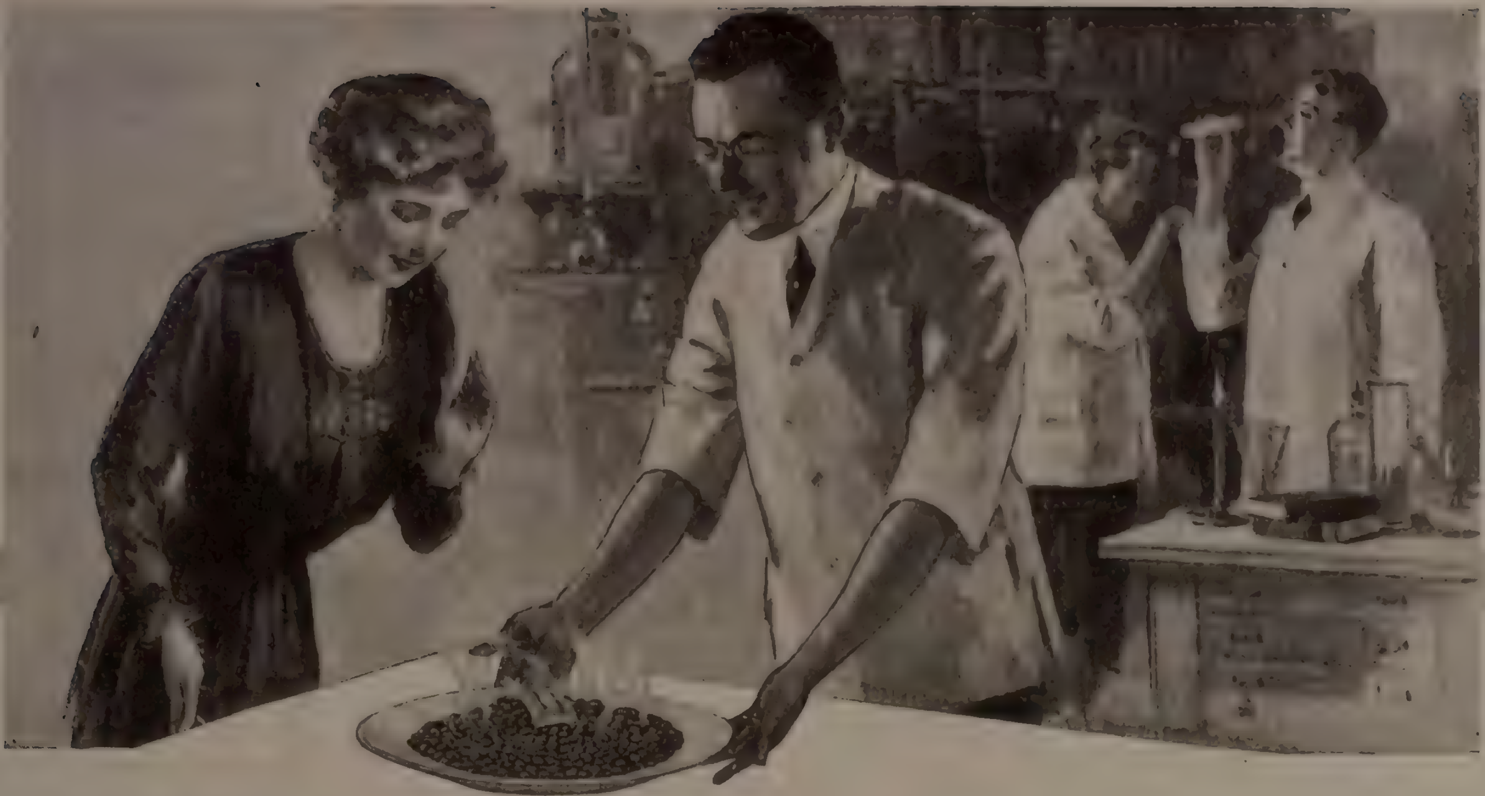
A VERY distinguished American theologian was asked recently what he believed the really fundamental and distinctive teachings of Protestant Evangelicalism to be. He replied, very simply, that he conceived them to be that man is a sinner. He cannot save himself. God's free grace comes to him through Jesus Christ and saves him. Then he added that it might be brought down to the one word "grace." This was the position of Luther. Was he right, and were the other great Reformation leaders right, or was something else essential to salvation? There never was a time when the answer to these questions was more important.

Certain it is that the Roman Catholic churches will celebrate the Reformation quadricentennial this year. Will any Protestant church ignore it?

It has been celebrated, and will be celebrated, by sermons, cantatas, pageants, editorials and articles in religious and secular journals, by endowments for Bible chairs in colleges, by special buildings and memorials, by medals, by addresses in colleges, by great community meetings.

Surely every Protestant church and Sunday school in America will in some appropriate way study and celebrate the deeds and the ideas which center around the movement which has done most to shape the religious and political life of the modern world.

It is a vastly better world than it would have been if Luther and his co-workers had not lived and taught and wrought. But we are all painfully conscious in these terrible years that theirs was an uncompleted work. This is stressed in the quadricentennial slogan "To Celebrate the Reformation of the sixteenth century and to hasten the transformation of the twentieth."



Our College Cooks

Present Some Marvelous Examples of Real Scientific Cookery

WE offer you some new delights in old, familiar dishes—particularly in Pork and Beans. New flavor, new texture, new fitness—results which will amaze you.

In the Van Camp kitchens, science has wrought a cooking revolution. It has changed the finest old-time dishes beyond all recognition. It will bring you new conceptions of the culinary art.

No More Guesswork

Cooking has become an exact science under these modern methods. It is done by experts, college-trained in chemistry and food hygiene.

A modern laboratory directs every kitchen process. Recipes have given place to scientific formulas, elaborate and exact.

A thousand tests are sometimes made to attain a pinnacle of flavor. Every step is recorded; so, when perfection is once reached, that flavor never changes. A single Van Camp formula covers pages of the most exact instructions. Every detail is minutely specified, to attain the desired result.

Materials are selected by analysis. Soils are studied, seeds selected—all to insure a super-flavor in every ingredient used.

Each result is a masterpiece of cookery. Under old methods, such perfection was impossible. You will find in these dishes the final touch of delicacy and flavor. We urge you to learn—and learn today—how much that means to you.

Compare This Dish
With Other Baked Pork and Beans

One fine example of this new-day cookery is Van Camp's Pork and Beans.

The beans are grown on soils which are very rare. Each lot is analyzed before we start to cook, for each requires some different cooking method.

The water used is freed from minerals. Science proves that ordinary water makes beans harder to digest.

The baking is done in steam ovens, so fierce heat can be applied for hours. That insures easy digestion. In ordinary ovens, such baking is impossible. Every bean would crisp.

The sauce baked with the beans is the final result of comparing 856 formulas. It marks the very limit in flavor, tang and zest.

This dish will be a revelation. Beans mealy and unbroken, yet perfectly baked. A sauce such as you never find elsewhere. Order a trial meal and see what these new methods mean.

Palestine, the War and the Jews

Ex-Rabbi Leopold Cohn

Never since Titus destroyed the city of God has the Jewish cry, "Back to Palestine," been nearer to fulfillment than now. In the thunder of the cannon on the blood-soaked fields of Europe, the voice of God is calling unto Israel, and He is working out, through the wrath of the nations, His eternal purposes for the Jew.

Are the Jews going to get to Palestine? Will England protect them there? Can Palestine hold them all?

All these questions will be discussed fully and ably, this winter, in our monthly paper, THE CHOSEN PEOPLE, edited by the famous Ex-Rabbi, Leopold Cohn. Not only will this remarkable little paper tell you of the Jews' interest in Christ as their Messiah, and how we are giving them the gospel, but we will print the latest Zionistic news, and show you how it is linked up to the Word of God.

Luther Anniversary Book

LUTHER IN LIGHT OF RECENT RESEARCH

WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the approaching celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous Thesis on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation. The Christian Herald has had the good fortune to secure the exclusive American rights of this book and has had it translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

This great book is supplemented by eighty-one Luther pictures, all of them from the most authentic sources, and the whole forming a Luther Picture Gallery.

The Life of Luther, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2.50, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

carefully treated that it comes out in clean sheets which look like layers of cream-colored Japanese crêpe. On other estates, the rubber is smoked and it comes into the market as smoked sheets. It has the color of glue, and is put up in bundles much like newspapers.

In the factories here in Akron I have seen crude rubber of every description. The larger establishments have acres of space filled with it from floor to roof. Some is from the rubber camps of the wilds in the shape of hams and balls ranging in size from a football to that of a bushel basket. These balls are dark brown or black. They are of the purest Para rubber, and they bounce into the air as they drop on the floor. I saw cords of what is known as crêpe rubber, which comes from the plantations of South Asia. The best of it is from the tops of the trees, and it is cured by coolies with acetic acid, which is something like vinegar.

There are altogether seventy different kinds of crude rubber. The most valuable is the Hevea, which comes through Para, and of which the plantation rubber is the descendant. Another grade is that from the vines or creepers of Africa. It is gathered by the negroes of the Kongo, much as on the Amazon, and it is smoked the same way. It comes to the market in strings rolled in balls of various sizes. This rubber is much less valuable than the Hevea or plantation rubber. The same is true of the Guayule rubber, which comes from a shrub on the desert table-lands of Mexico. The shrubs are pulled up and taken to the factories, where they are crushed and thrown into hot water. As the water boils the rubber rises to the top, while the wood goes to the bottom. The rubber is skimmed off. It is worth about 60 per cent. less than that of Para.

So much for crude rubber and the far-away places where it is grown. The most interesting part of the story is the adventures of the product after it gets to the factory and goes out in a thousand shapes to help mankind on its march through the world. Above all, of especial interest just now is the part that rubber is playing in our great war in Europe, and how upon it may depend the success or defeat of our army. These matters I shall take up in my next letter.

Rural Church Reading Club

THE Rural Church Reading Club Movement was originated by Professor Garland A. Bricker of Syracuse, N. Y., University. The movement is a part of the work of the Rural Extension Service of the University. It is contemplated that at least one thousand churches will take part in this reading and study work. There are no fees attached to membership; any group of Christian workers can organize a club for the purpose of reading the course of lessons on rural church problems and opportunities. These lessons were written by Professor Bricker, and are entitled, "The Church in Rural America." Each chapter is followed with a list of questions and suggestions for discussion.

WHILE the social fabric of any community is limited by its industrial prosperity, yet, on the other hand, a low social life will not inspire nor support a high standard of industrial and economic efficiency. The social and industrial, the religious and economic developments of society must go hand in hand to sustain one another. Every rural preacher and layman may today serve his country and his God by intensifying the efficiency of the church activities in his home community. A Christian farmer will be a better Christian by responding to the nation's call for more food with increased devotion to his calling in both agricultural and church lines.

Milk As a Food

By DR. W. H. VAIL

THERE are three single articles of food that will sustain life for an almost indefinite period of time. These three articles are milk, eggs and whole wheat. When we mention whole wheat we mean any whole grain, such as wheat, rye, oats, corn, barley or rice; for while they all differ in minute details as to their composition, yet in the main they contain the same elements that are so essential to the preservation of life and the procuring of health and efficiency. Of the three articles of diet mentioned above, milk is the most essential to health. In fact, "pure milk is the most important single article of food for the infant, the growing child, and the adult." So states the United States government in a circular issued in the fall of 1916. We all know the value of milk as an article of food for the young of all animals, but few are willing to, or do, recognize its importance for the growing child, and very seldom do we hear it urged as diet for the adult.

In this connection we cannot do better than to give tersely some facts contained in this circular as issued by the United States government under the heading, "Drink More Milk." "We throw away the bones and blood in our meat diet. Milk contains 88 per cent. water and 12 per cent. solids. This means that a quart of milk contains about four ounces of solids. So it requires four quarts of milk to make one pound of solids. At twelve cents a quart this means forty-eight cents for one pound of solids for the system to appropriate. To equal this result it takes 91 cents' worth of roast beef at twenty-five cents per pound; 84 cents' worth of beefsteak at 25 cents per pound; $1.07 worth of veal at 24 cents per pound; $2.47 worth of roast chicken at 35 cents per pound; $1.38 worth of halibut at 25 cents per pound; $2.29 worth of oysters at 1 cent each; $1.22 worth of eggs at 45 cents a dozen; Pork, lamb, and mutton nearly double the price of milk, to obtain the same strength."

This shows how milk contains all the ingredients that go to make up a perfect food, especially for the young of all animals; and if you add to it certain coarser elements, which we find in the vegetable kingdom, to compose the "roughage," as we call it, you have the perfect diet for the adult, as well as for the youngest child or animal. Not only is this true, but we are coming to recognize the fact that not only is milk good for all ages on the individual, but is necessary for the best development of the whole being, and that the liberal use of milk tends to prolong life.

MILK contains, besides the usually mentioned salts, casein, fats, etc., certain vitamines, substances about which we know very little today, but which are coming to be considered more and more essential to the well-being of the individual. It is believed to be one of the functions of these vitamines to protect the system against disease germs, thus tending to preserve the health, and it is further believed that it is the vitamines that are destroyed by the process of pasteurizing milk. No substitute has ever been found for milk.

There is no more important question today for the consideration of Mr. Hoover than to see that the people may be supplied with a proper amount of pure, clean milk. The situation is fast becoming critical, when we recall the fact that the supply of milk is not keeping pace with the increased growth of our population. So states Mr. Hoover in a recent article. Not only is it true that the supply of milk is not keeping pace with the increased growth of our people, but the fact is that the amount of milk produced this year does not equal that produced last year. And we do well to turn our attention to the reasons for this shortage in the supply of this most essential article of food. Why are farmers selling their cattle? This brings us to the issue as we see it today. While increased cost of cattle food is one of the causes for the decreased supply of milk, there are other reasons for which the public is responsible, we believe, and these should be remedied.

WE are a nation of faddists. Respecting the subject of milk, yesterday it was tuberculosis, today it is the danger from the bacteria in the milk, tomorrow it will be something else. Too many cows become tuberculous, but we will soon learn the fact that because a cow responds to the tuberculin test is no reason why she should immediately be slaughtered. Thousands of valuable cattle have been needlessly killed and as a consequence large numbers of farmers have become discouraged and disposed of their herds. We can develop tuberculosis in any herd of cattle in six months, or a year, by simply limiting their exercise and the supply of fresh air. The only reason why the horse is practically exempt from tuberculosis, while the cow so often suffers from it, is that the horse is always exercised in the fresh air, while in the case of the cow her mammary glands are developed at the expense of her lungs. In fact, very often she is confined in close quarters, and prevented from ordinary exercise, in order that the food she consumes may produce all the milk possible.

Again, we magnify the danger of tuberculosis being conveyed to the human being through the milk. We believe that tuberculosis is seldom spread to the human being through the drinking of milk. The fact that a child, whose food is principally milk, develops tuberculosis, is not conclusive evidence that the milk caused the disease, for there are other causes of this disease outside of the food, principal among which are lack of fresh air, etc.

Another cause for the diminished supply of milk is found in connection with the insistence, in many cities and towns, that the milk must be pasteurized.

Nobody claims that pasteurization of milk renders impure milk pure. On the other hand, it destroys certain delicate elements in the milk, and renders it unnatural, to say the least. The milk is never the same in composition after being pasteurized. It will not sour, but it rots, and becomes very dangerous, if not used within a certain number of hours after undergoing the process; and therefore the law requires that the hour of pasteurization be stamped upon the cover of the bottle. Nothing is gained by pasteurizing the milk which will not be gained just as efficiently by simply bringing the milk to the boiling point. The milk is pure enough as it comes from the cow. Why not confine our attention to the safe conveyance of the milk from the cow to the consumer? There is where the whole trouble lies. The typhoid germs are not in the milk as it comes from the cow, but gain access to the milk at some point after it has left the cow. Let the implements be sterilized by using boiling water. Insist that everything around the dairy plant be scrupulously clean and sanitary, including the milkers, as well as the wagons and cars used in conveying the milk to the homes of the consumers; for typhoid germs, which have caused small epidemics of the fever, have gained access to the coverings of the bottles when the milk was being delivered in milk routes. The pasteurizing of the milk will not prevent such experiences.

In all of this discussion about milk as an article of food we find a far call to the simple life. Purposely we have avoided long words and professional terms. We have not mentioned calories, have not spoken of proteins, and only once or twice used the word bacteria.

Milk, unlike almost every other article of food, contains nothing that entails extra work upon the kidneys and liver. All the ingredients of milk contribute to the upbuilding of the system and this is the only article that is one hundred per cent. food.

UNUSUAL RENEWAL OFFERS

National Bible Picture Study

READERS of the Christian Herald remember well the two interesting and extremely helpful Bible Picture Study competitions we have conducted.

In the first Study $3,500.00 in cash rewards were distributed to the 419 successful participants.

In the second Study, for which the winners are now being determined, cash rewards of $5,628.00 will shortly be awarded to 1,000 participants.

A More Wonderful Picture Story Plan

Now comes the greatest, yet the simplest, the most interesting and therefore the most pleasingly informing Bible Study of them all—a National Bible Picture Study.

In this third Study there will be fewer pictures. We will furnish a book of about 2000 Bible verses from which the answers are to be selected and also an Answer Book in which to write down the answers. These two books will constitute the outfit.

Reserve Your Outfit Now

A complete outfit and a year's subscription to the Christian Herald will be furnished for $2.10. Send in your renewal now and we will enroll your name in the National Bible Picture Study. An outfit with complete information will be sent to you just as soon as the books are ready to be distributed. IT IS ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY THAT YOU ASK FOR THIS OUTFIT WHEN SENDING YOUR SUBSCRIPTION. $2.10

The Pictorial Life of Christ

Eighty Magnificent Sculptural Illustrations by the Famous Italian Master-Sculptor, DOMENICO MASTRIOANNI

THESE magnificent pictures are not paintings. They are something finer. The originals are combinations of sculpture and sculptural reliefs done in wax and clay and wonderfully grouped and photographed in such a way as to bring out in sharp contrast the lights and shadows and perspectives. The resulting photograph is something absolutely and entirely different in the history of art. There is a depth of space realized in looking at these pictures that you have never known in looking at a drawing or painting.

In simple, attractive language, the story of the life of Jesus is told by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd, who has adhered faithfully to the narrative in the Gospels. He is a lucid and sympathetic writer and gives a clear conception of the social, religious and political conditions in Galilee during the time Christ was upon earth. No expense has been spared in producing a book worthy in every respect of these wonderful pictures. The binding is an extremely handsome design in white vellum with red and blue letters. Size, 7 x 10 inches.

We will send The Pictorial Life of Christ, and the Christian Herald for one year, for only.......... $2.25

Martin Luther Anniversary Book

WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, "Luther in Light of Recent Research," which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the celebration of the Four Hundredth Anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous theses on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation.

The Christian Herald has had the work translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and the expression of the original in a remarkable degree. This great book is supplemented by eighty-one Luther pictures, all of them from the most authentic sources, and the whole forming a Luther Picture Gallery.

We will send the "Life of Luther," handsomely bound in cloth, postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for........ $2.50 publications that have notoriously sought to give aid and comfort to the enemy need fear the censorship clauses. The act covers disloyal matter of all kinds including books, circulars, letters and telegrams. A late amendment added to the bill just before its passage closed all other avenues of transportation to publications excluded from the mails. Postmaster General Burleson on September 26 told the staff correspondent of the New York Tribune that he meant to enforce the law; that it did not mean a political censorship. He was quoted as saying: "Any newspaper of any political opinion or any shade of opinion can say anything it chooses in legitimate criticism of the President, the Administration, the army, the navy or the conduct of the war. . . But there is a limit, and that limit is reached when it begins to say that this government got in the war wrong, and that it is in it for wrong purposes, or anything that would impugn the motives of the government for going into the war. They cannot say that this government is the tool of Wall Street or the munition-makers. That kind of thing makes for insubordination in the army and navy, and breeds a spirit of disloyalty through the country. It is a false statement, a lie, and it will not be permitted. And nothing can be said to incite people to resist the laws. . . . There can be nothing said to hamper and obstruct the government in the prosecution of the war. Political criticism, on the other hand can go any lengths it will."

OUR FRIEND JAPAN. It was announced on September 24 that the Japanese mission had practically concluded its work in this country. Secretary Lansing was quoted as saying: "The conference with Viscount Ishii had been of a most satisfactory character, and I think his visit to this country has been most helpful in benefiting the relations between the two countries." In a recent address Viscount Ishii declared that the periodical and inexplicable outbursts of the anti-Japanese feeling in American and anti-American articles in Japanese papers were a part of the world-wide German propaganda. It was announced, in connection with the work of the mission, that Japan had transferred 300,000 tons, about one-third of her merchant tonnage, to European waters, and that she could not detach any more for service outside of her own commerce without serious industrial sacrifice.

THE WAR TAX. The conferees of the Senate and House finally agreed on September 27 on the War Revenue Bill. It was expected that the bill would be reported to the two Houses of Congress on October 1. The bill is expected to raise about $2,700,000,000 in addition to the $1,333,000,000 to be raised by existing revenue laws, the final total being about $300,000,000 above the estimated taxing power of the Senate bill. The excess profits tax was changed to run from 15 per cent. to 60 per cent., the rate increasing with the percentage of excess income above normal income, which is to be figured at from seven to nine per cent. on capital stock invested. The publishers' tax was finally fixed on a zone basis, the first zone being reduced from 250 to 150 miles, and the rates increasing with the distance, as in the parcel post. The actual rates adopted had not been announced at this writing. A one cent tax was also levied on letter mail. Automobiles, patent medicines, perfumes, cosmetics, and it is said also, checks, will be taxed. The 16 per cent. tax on munition-makers, stricken out of the bill in the Senate, was restored.

LIBERTY LOAN, NUMBER TWO. Secretary McAdoo announced on September 27 that the second offering of Liberty Loan Bonds would be made October 1, the offering to consist of $3,000,000,000 in 4 per cent. bonds, exempt from Federal and State taxation except estate and inheritance taxes, excess profit taxes and graduated income surtaxes. The issue was not limited to $3,000,000,000, but it was said that bonds would probably be issued in excess of that figure to about half of the amount of the oversubscription. Subscriptions close October 27.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Irish Convention reassembled on September 25 and appointed a grand committee to prepare a possible scheme for submission to the convention which would meet the views and difficulties expressed by various members during the course of the deliberations of the convention. . . . Herbert Hoover has issued a plea to the American people to save on sugar in order that 100,000 tons might be exported to France in October. He said that, while Americans were using a little under four ounces per day per person, the French ration was under an ounce and the English and Italian not over that amount. Mr. Hoover said: "Sugar, even to a greater amount than the French ration, is required for human necessities, and if our people will reduce by one-third their purchases and consumption of candy and of sugar or other uses than preserving fruit, which we do not wish to interfere with, we can save the French situation." . . . The House of Representatives on September 24, adopted, 181 to 107, a special rule to create a Committee on Woman Suffrage. . . . The Food Administration feels that "buckwheat cakes for breakfast—would not be much of a hardship. Add maple syrup or Porto Rico molasses, and who wouldn't welcome that substitute for wheat cakes, wheat bread or rolls? The Canada buckwheat crop, we are assured, is one of the best in recent years, and that makes sure the buckwheat cakes"! . . . Secretary Lansing announced on September 26 that negotiations had been begun between this country, Great Britain, France and Italy looking toward the waiving by those countries of the treaty rights under which their nationals may seek exemption from military service in this country. Secretary Lansing opposed a pending resolution in Congress which sought to make it impossible for an alien to become a citizen of the United States if he avoided military service by pleading his treaty rights. . . . Following the handing down of indictments by a Federal Grand Jury against 168 members of the I. W. W., charging them with seditious conspiracy, government agents raided the organization's headquarters in Chicago on September 28, arresting about 100 persons, among them William D. Haywood, general secretary of the I. W. W. . . . Brigadier General William Crozier, chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, U. S. A., issued a statement on September 28 announcing that all the soldiers who went to France would be equipped with a new modern rifle recently perfected, so designed that all parts are interchangeable. Three army factories and the government plants were on that date turning out 1,300 rifles per day and the rate of delivery was increasing. . . . Colonel E. M. House, the President's former unofficial ambassador, has been commissioned to prepare the material which shall enable America's representatives to make her voice effective at the conference which, some day, will resolve conflict into peace.

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

ON September 20, after several days of artillery preparation, the British launched an offensive on a front of about eight miles north and south of the road leading eastward from Ypres to Menin, in the Flanders sector of the western front. From Ypres one road runs northeast to Roulers, while another road runs southeasterly to Menin. It was to the northward of the first road and between the first and second roads that the British attack made its greatest gain. The distance between these two roads was about two miles, and from the northerly road to the end of the line on which the British made an advance of importance is perhaps a mile and a half more. South of the Menin road the advance was serious only for about a mile. On this five-mile front the Germans were driven back an average distance of more than one-half mile.

The British announced the taking of about 2,700 prisoners in this affair, and the Germans seemed to have gathered in three or four hundred in counter-attacks. During the next three or four days, the Germans counter-attacked with great violence.

On the morning of September 26 the British began a fresh offensive on the same front, and again gained ground after very strenuous fighting. This gain was most marked in the region of Zonnebeke. The town of that name being taken by storm and an advance of half a mile made. North of the Ypres-Menin road, after a severe struggle lasting nearly all day, the British made a small advance, but on the extreme north of the front in the St. Julien sector the advance was more marked, and extended to a half-mile. The Germans immediately counter-attacked on the whole line in great force, and the fighting continued all night.

There will be unquestionably further heavy fighting on this front. Strategically the movement is an attempt by the British to drive their Ypres salient so far to the east as to make it a menace to the continued holding of Lille by the Germans.

ON the French portion of the front, for three or four days in the early part of the week, there was a rather violent artillery duel along the whole length of the Chemin des Dames, north of the Aisne, but no infantry fighting of any importance followed. On the 24th of September the northern front of Verdun again became active after a rather long period of calm. The Germans attacked the French trenches north of the Chaume wood on a mile-and-a-half front. This wood lies on the road from Ornes to Bras, almost directly north of Fort Douaumont. According to the French accounts the Germans succeeded in penetrating their trenches, but after violent fighting were driven out. Subsequently two other attacks were made on the same position, which the French assert were repulsed. The German version, however, states that four hundred yards of French trenches were captured and held against counter-attacks, besides which 550 prisoners were captured.

London has been twice raided by air during the week.

According to the British Admiralty, the sinkings of British merchant vessels by submarines during the week ending September 22 aggregated fifteen of which thirteen were steamers of over 1,600 tons, and two under. This is the smallest number weekly reported since last February. On the other hand, the French had a bad week, losing six large steamers and three small ones.

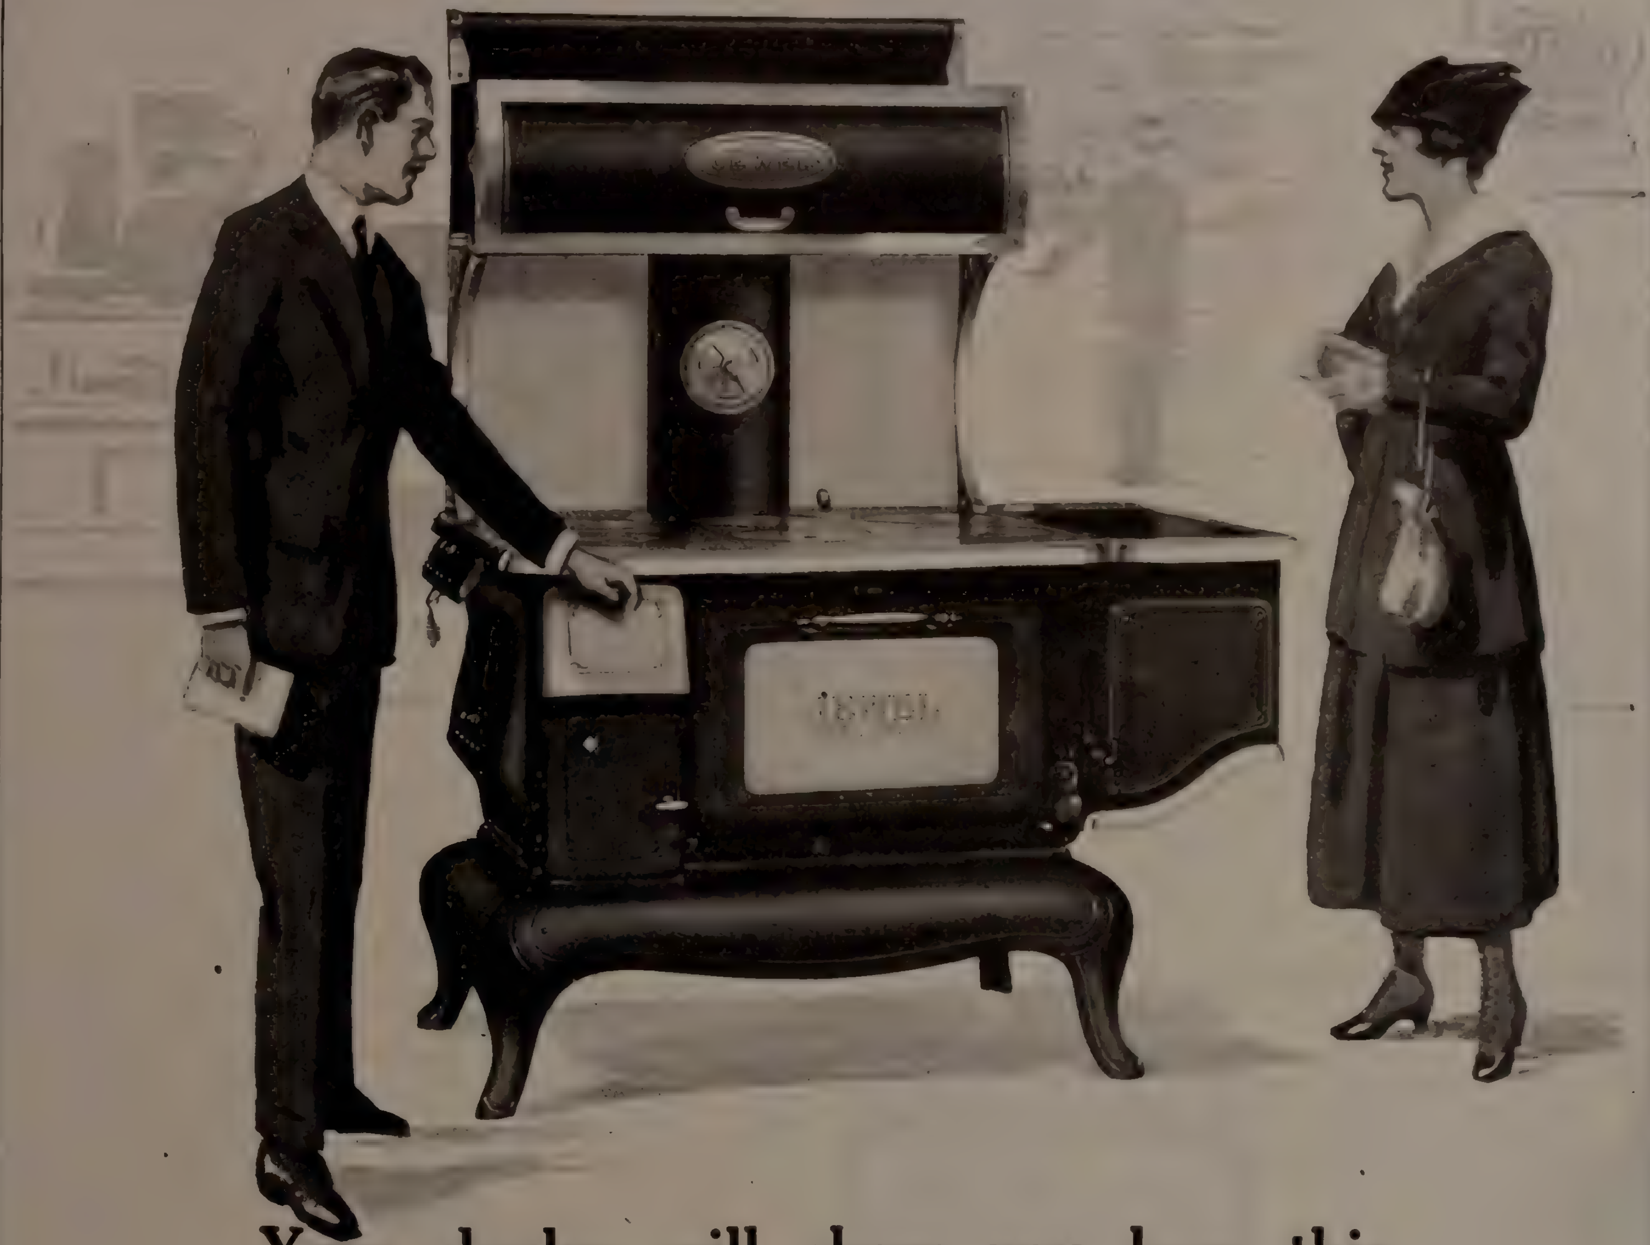
The British report inflicting another defeat upon the Germans in German Southeast Africa, and state that they have now very nearly finished the work of conquering that colony.

On the Russian front the event of the week was the capture of the bridgehead of Jacobstadt on the Dvina, about half way between Riga and Dunaberg.

General Alexieff, after holding the position a week, resigned as Chief of Staff, and General Douckonini has been appointed to succeed him.

The so-called Democratic Congress, composed of delegates from most of the political organizations of Russia, met in Petrograd on September 26. This congress appears to be under control of the advanced radicals, who are today very hostile to Premier Kerensky. Kerensky addressed the Congress on September 28, defending his cabinet and its measures. His statement that the Soldiers' and Workmen's delegates at Helsingfors had refused to oppose the forbidden reopening of the Finnish Diet was greeted with cheers from the Bolsheviki radicals. The premier was reported to have responded, "Cheer, my friends, if you will, but bear in mind that a German fleet is moving up the Baltic."

M. Avksentieff, president of the Council of Peasants' delegates, said before the Congress that the moment had arrived for democracy to gather all its political wisdom to save the conquests of the revolution, which were threatened with irreparable catastrophe.



Your dealer will show you how this Jewel "COAL SAVER" Range produces 100° more heat from same fuel

The new patented fire-back, which secures 100 degrees more heat from the fuel consumed, is a wonderful invention. It feeds the necessary pre-heated air to the fire to cause the most complete combustion of the gases liberated from the burning fuel, and produce the most intense heat. The greatest heating value of the fuel is obtained—it does not escape into the chimney flue. This is a money saving feature, and one that helps pay back the cost of the range. Read the other special advantages of this range which make it the ideal range for the home.

A Range of Great Durability

The body is made from Kemi-Test Iron—the smoothest, most lasting iron known to stove-making. It does not rust out and become worthless in a few years. This iron retains the heat in the range—no asbestos is required—no interlinings. There is nothing to disintegrate—nothing to give trouble. The body of this range has double the life of steel bodied ranges.

A Range of Great Beauty

It is so sanitary with its porcelain splasher back and oven door panel, which makes the range beautiful and an ornament to the kitchen. Gives distinction and shows quality. Every owner is proud of a range equipped in this way. It makes the kitchen, where 90% of your work is done, much more pleasant to work in.

A Range that Is Easy to Clean

It is equipped with a "mirror finish" cooking top which is smooth as glass in outward appearance. It radiates heat quickly, and secures the full benefit of the more intense heat of the Coal Saver Firebox. Will not sag or crack. Requires no blacking—wipes clean with a cloth.

All other parts of the range are made smooth. There are no grease and dirt collecting ornaments. The range stays clean. Nickeled parts lift off. Cleaning work is reduced to a minimum.

A Perfect Baker

Stronger heat makes baking quicker. Scientifically designed flues insure perfect heat distribution. Oven bakes evenly top and bottom. Wonderful baking results are obtained.

and friends visiting men in service in the army posts.

"To provide salaries and traveling expenses of specially appointed secretaries who are being sent to Russia, France and England at the request of leading Christian workers in those countries; to act as advisers, and to help the plans which are necessary in the reconstruction work for women in European lands.

"To make possible the employment by the War Work Council of women who are giving their time to the industrial, the housing and the cafeteria problems incident to war-work industries; to secure workers to safeguard and advise non-English-speaking women; and to provide a special investigator who is reporting on conditions among colored women near training camps."

THE first branch of the War Work Council's service is to watch over the girls in localities near military and naval training-camps. "Girls," said Miss Paddock, "especially very young girls, need the care and interest of some experienced women. There is a certain fascination about brass buttons. Not long ago some girls were loitering near an encampment, talking and laughing loudly to attract the attention of the soldiers. They were not bad girls; they were only very young and very careless. Finally one of the soldiers went up and spoke to one of the girls. She answered him, and it ended by his requesting her permission to escort her home. She giggled and assented.

"Finally they reached her gate. And then the soldier, suddenly looking her squarely in the eye, said: 'I'm going in, now, to meet your mother!'

"The girl was plainly embarrassed. 'Oh, no, you mustn't!' she said. 'You see——'

"The soldier did see. That was why he went into the house and told a waiting mother that she had better pay more attention to the comings and goings of her child. 'It's rather lucky,' he finished, 'that I was the one she happened to pick up!'"

The Y. W. C. A., in its work around camps, will endeavor to do away with such incidents.

And then comes the second branch—the opening of clubs. This movement is not confined to the districts near camps; it is a nation-wide movement, for the Y. W. C. A. is endeavoring to get every girl in our land interested in a wonderful Patriotic League. The pledge taken by each member of the league will give a better idea of its aims than anything that I can tell. The pledge reads:

"I pledge to express my patriotism—

"By doing better than ever before whatever work I have to do;

"By rendering whatever special service I can at this time to my community and country;

"By living up to the highest standards of character and honor, and by helping others to do the same."

One of the finest sides of the Council's work is the third branch, the business of securing accommodations for young women who are strangers in a strange city. Many girls have brothers or sweethearts or husbands in the army. And many of them live far away and are rich only in love. Many of them could not afford hotel prices, even if they knew where to go. The women in charge of this branch find comfortable, safe, and economical lodgings for visiting girls, and make their stay near their dear ones free from worry.

IT has been a problem with army authorities to entertain and provide a meeting-place for the women who come to see boys who are studying at training-camps. The War Work Council has solved the problem with its Hostess Houses.

Hostess Houses are club rooms, meeting-places, and information bureaus rolled into one. There are Hostess Houses at all of the large camps, and many mother hearts offer up thanks when, after a long journey, the help and courtesy of the Y. W. C. A. is made apparent.

The fifth branch of work—the co-operation with Europe—is perhaps the newest of all. And yet it has a rather wonderful report to give; for a first party, directly under the auspices of the Council, has already sailed for France. It is made up of two distinct groups of workers—American nurses, and secretaries who will start clubs and recreation centers in munition towns.

A special worker has gone to England to act as a consultant upon the important issues facing the country. And two Y. W. C. A. secretaries, recognizing the new social and economic conditions that prevail among the women of Russia, have been in Petrograd since May. They are busy laying out an efficient plan of helpfulness.

The sixth and, at present, last branch of the War Work is the work among the less educated women, the women—many of them non-English-speaking foreigners—who work with their hands. These women are hurriedly filling places left open by the unskilled laboring men who have enlisted or been drafted. These women are, maybe, in less moral danger than some of their sisters; but their minds are being poisoned by rumors incorrectly translated, and their sense of values is being distorted by a too slight knowledge of the factory world they have been thrust into.

NOT long ago a soldier went up to a girl on the street and spoke to her. "I think," she told him, "that you're making a mistake. Most girls—if they're the right sort—resent this kind of thing."

The soldier—he was a very new, very young soldier—flushed.

"Say," he stammered, "I'm sorry. I didn't stop to think. And I'm glad you called me down. A fellow likes to think that a girl's—on the level!"

A real man does like to think that the women of his family, of his town, of his nation, are fine, good women. A real man likes to place all women on a pedestal beside his mother. And the War Work Council of the Y. W. C. A. is trying to bring this fact home to the girlhood of America. A soldier may flirt with a pretty, flashily dressed girl; he may amuse himself with the too loud girl. He may spend a few idle hours with the girl who has no real aim in life. . . .

But when a soldier wants an ideal to carry close to his heart—a worth while dream to make life and—death—in a foreign country a bit easier, it's the "on the level" Christian girl that he turns to.

The War Work Council, with Miss Paddock directing it from her overflowing desk, is trying to make every girl in our land the sort of girl who may honestly be idealized.

Paris Using Coal Cards

IF you were living in Paris now and found yourself in need of coal for cooking or heating purposes, you would be required to present a coal card at the time of purchase, and even then you could not buy more than a stipulated amount. This arrangement has been found necessary at this stage of the war, and is in accordance with an agreement entered into between the government and the municipal council of Paris, effective September 1. It applies only to coal intended for household use and not for commercial use. A family of three or less persons is limited to 264.5 pounds per month; of four or five persons, 330.7 pounds per month; of six or more persons, 396.8 pounds each month. During the severe winter months, an additional allowance of 66.1 pounds may be made, although the agreement does not guarantee this. It would be interesting to know, for instance, how a man with a wife and child, living in a six-room house, would be able to keep warm during the coldest weather, or even in the moderate winter weather, on a monthly allowance of one-third of a ton of coal, when his furnace ordinarily consumes about one ton per month. The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A MEMBER of the League, recently married, has asked us how to rear a family altar. Apparently convinced of the necessity of regular devotion in the home, she seemed to feel herself face to face with an impregnable mountain of difficulty. Her husband was a member of the church and her letter indicated that he had joined with her in her desire that their home life should be properly related to God and His service. Yet they asked how to begin. The way to begin is just to begin. Read a psalm or a passage of other Scripture and then kneel down together and pray. Let each pray in turn. It doesn't make any difference whether your prayer is beautifully expressed, or whether it is no more than a few broken sentences. If it lays the desire of your heart before God, if it spreads your life open before him, if it reveals a sincere desire to approach him and to know more of his grace and his truth, the prayer will be answered. God waits always to draw near to those who draw near to him. Short prayers from the heart are always better than long petitions from the intellect. If guidance in family devotion is felt to be desirable, books are available that suggest readings for a year or for a series of weeks, with suitable prayers; or the texts in the Daily Meditation or daily readings suggested in connection with the Sunday School Lesson may be followed with profit. The principal thing is to desire the blessing of God on your home and to seek it regularly on your knees. He will bless your little strength and will increase it by his own.

Mrs. M. H. G. asks the mothers of the United States to pray for peace and for the brave soldier boys, and she suggests the reading of the following Scriptures. Ps. 19 : 14; 37 : 4, 5; and Matt. 6 : 16 and 17 : 18. We suggest the day this paragraph of the Prayer League Column is read, or as soon thereafter as any reader may first see it.

A. N. B. ask prayer for the reconciliation of a minister and his fiancée, who have been estranged, and also acknowledges an answer to prayer in the recovery of her mother from a severe accident without an operation.

Mrs. L. D. last winter asked the League to pray for the conversion of two young men who were addicted to drink. She praises God that both were converted and have united with the church. She prays for the conversion of some of her own family and for a home for herself and a place to work for Christ. All these prayers were answered. She now asks for the conversion of other members of the family and restoration of health for friends and herself.

Mrs. T. J. K. praises God for healing of eyesight for a dear sister, and asks prayers for another sister who is suffering from nervous prostration.

G. W. L. asks the prayers of all Christians that a judge may be led to make a just and righteous decision in the case of a dispute over church property.

J. P. E. sends a newspaper clipping concerning the Prayer Army of the White Cross.

W. H. F. asks prayers for God's blessing on the Sunday revival at Los Angeles, Calif., and gives details of the preliminary work.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Millington, Mich.; New London, N. H.; Youngstown, Ohio; Williamstown, N. J., Austin, Texas (that many may be saved during revival); Markesan, Wis. (that many may be saved during revival); Brookdale, Manitoba, Canada (for an outpuring of the Holy Spirit); Mrs. L. D. (that the Prohibition law may be passed this fall); Middlebury, Vt.; Grooville, N. Y.; Hickory Plains, Ark.; Christiana, Tenn. (that many may be saved during revival)

Mrs. S. G. asks prayer that husband's and own mind may be strengthened; five friends ask prayer that relatives' or friends' minds may be restored; Mrs. H. B., and M. E. J., that their daughters' minds may be restored; Mrs. J. W. S., that a woman's mind may be restored

Four friends ask prayer that sight may be restored; Mrs. L. A. K. and L. K., that their sister's sight may be restored; Mrs. E. A. S., that grandson's sight may be restored; E. B., that cataracts may be removed and sight strengthened; M. B. N., that husband's sight may be restored; eight, that other friends' or relatives' sight may be restored.

Nine friends ask prayer for the restoration of hearing

Thirteen friends ask prayer for special blessing for others, including Mrs. J. W. M. and An Anxious Mother, that sons who have enlisted may be guided in all things and return safely home when the war is over; another, E. C., for our sailors and our soldiers.

Forty-four ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing

M. S. asks prayer that husband may be cured of the liquor habit. Mrs. J. N. A. and Mrs. C. H., that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit. A. F., that a woman may be cured of the liquor habit

Forty-seven friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives; thirty-eight, for the healing of self, including M., that health may be restored without an operation; Mrs. S. B. P., to be cured of cancer; Mrs. E. R. R., that a friend may be healed without an operation; another, Mrs. M. F., that two daughters may be restored to health and strength.

Seventeen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; five wives, their husbands; forty-three, other relatives and friends.

Twenty-seven friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Thirty-one friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including four that we may have world-wide peace.

Mrs. J. G. asks prayer that three brothers may be cured of the liquor habit; E. E. B., that brother may be cured of the liquor habit; A Mother, that son may be cured of the liquor habit; P. S., to be cured of the liquor habit.

M. M. B., that a young man may be cured of the smoking habit; Miss E. V. H., that brother may be cured of the tobacco habit.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

A. N. B., Bay View, Mich.; J. M., Philadelphia, Pa.; Mrs. J. W. S., Meriden, Conn.; R. F. F., Peterstown, W. Va.; A Subscriber, Pawlet, Vt.; M. A. H., Carnegie, Pa.; A Believer, The Ridge, Ky.; A Believer, Christiana, Tenn.

The Things of My Heart

I LOVE books and music; life and nature; man and God.

I love books because they develop my mind, teach me the lesson of life, give me joy, often chime with my own mood; and through them I gain acquaintance with strong, true, noble men and women.

I love music because it exalts the spirit above the commonplace, and because, listening to it, I am nearest to reaching out and touching God's hand.

I love life because it is action, and action is pleasure. I love to draw in God's pure air, to breathe the fragrance of flowers, to see their rich colors and touch their velvet petals. I love labor and the peace of rest; and I believe that only in congenial work well done lies happiness.

I love nature because it reveals God and leads me to something higher than man can achieve. I love moonlight in a cloud-flecked sky above the pine-trees, and star-clusters twinkling as I gaze upward. I love sunny meadows, flecked by the shadows of trees. I love the songs of birds.

I love Man. I love those most who need me most, and in serving them lies the greatest happiness. I love babies because they are helpless, because they are pure, because the clutch of their fingers leads us nearer God. I love those who sin as I sin, for they suffer as I suffer. I love those who struggle as I struggle.

I love God because he is love; because he guides our lives though we choose our own paths; because he gives us all pleasures, physical, mental and spiritual. I love to watch his Spirit working in man's heart, bringing forth sweet fruit.

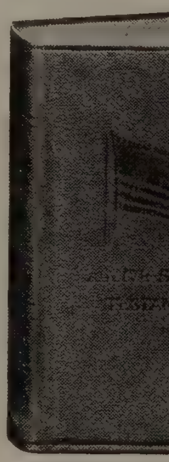
CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

The Gospel in Khaki

By REV. EDGAR DEWITT JONES, D.D.

YOUNG man in uniform, here is a little book. It is a copy of the New Testament, made especially for you and your fellow soldiers and sailors. Two million copies of this little book have thus far been distributed among the fighting men in Europe. Seven hundred thousand copies of the Gospel in khaki have been ordered by the Y. M. C. A. for distribution in America. Every Bible publishing house in the world is taxed to the utmost to meet the continuous demand for pocket editions of the New Testament in khaki. President Wilson, in a recent statement urging Bible reading among the soldiers, said, "The Bible is the Word of God. I beg that you will read it and find this out for yourselves—read, not little snatches here and there, but long passages. When you have read the Bible you will know that it is the Word of God because you will have found it the key to your own heart, your own happiness, and your own duty."



In like spirit millions of American Christians say to you dear lads who have answered the call to the colors, "Read this little book. Read it every day. It is a mine of undiscovered wealth. There is something in it for every experience."

If you are lonely, reflect on the words in Matthew 28 : 20, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

If discouraged, meditate on First Corinthians 15 : 58, "Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for as much as ye know that your labor is not vain in the Lord."

If inclined to murmur or complain, consider Second Timothy 2:3, 4, "Suffer hardship with me, as a good soldier of Christ Jesus. No soldier on service entangleth himself in the affairs of this life, that he may please him who enrolled him as a soldier."

If terribly tempted, let your mind dwell on First Corinthians 10 : 13, "There hath no temptation taken you but such as man can bear: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation make also the way of escape, that ye may be able to endure it."

If beset by impure or vicious thoughts, think on Philippians 4 : 8, "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honourable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things."

If appalled by the thought of sudden death, remember Revelation 14 : 13, "And I heard a voice from heaven saying, Write, Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; for their works follow with them."

If possible, let your last reading before you go to sleep be the eighth chapter of Romans, and your first reading after you awake the first twelve verses of the fifth of Matthew.

In a little while you may be far away from home and even native land, but this little book is able to comfort you like the sweet haven of mother's arms and to soothe your heart yearnings like her gentle kiss upon your cheek. God bless you, young man in khaki, God bless and keep you; and when a peace dawns that shall justify democracy the world over, may you come back to us whole of body and soul; but if you do not come back, may the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of Mercies and God of all Comfort, keep you as in His hand.

How You Can Help Our Boys at the Front

EVERY mail that reaches the Christian Herald office shows how our readers appreciate the opportunity which our Soldiers and Sailors Fund offers for doing real missionary service among the boys in the ranks. To put a Testament or a Christian Herald in the hands of every member of our new National Army, before he goes to the front, is an enterprise that should enlist the ardent support of every reader of this journal. We hope to send the Testaments and Heralds out by the thousands, and that they may prove a comfort and solace to our boys.

Anticipating the great demand for Testaments in this work, we have made arrangements for liberal supplies. They are put at such a price that there is no need of any one who reads the Christian Herald being unrepresented in the work. Young and old, rich and poor, alike have here an opportunity to send the message of salvation to our soldier and sailor boys, and the steadily increasing number of responses to the call shows how it is appreciated.

If you have a son, or a brother, or a sweetheart, or a friend who has been called for service, what better service could you render than to send him the Christian Herald every week?

The Christian Herald will be delivered direct to the camp. No matter where the soldier or sailor goes, the Christian Herald will follow him. The Post-office will take care of that. A neat gift card, giving the name of the donor, will be sent to the soldier or sailor for whom you order the Christian Herald.

Every gift for the Soldiers and Sailors Fund and for supplying this journal to the boys in khaki should be addressed "Soldiers and Sailors Fund," Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Young People's Topics for October 21

Religion and Politics

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Isa. 1 : 10-17 (Good Citizenship Day)

FROM the earliest ages the history of which is revealed to the men of today, the science of government, commonly called politics, has been sharply divided into two schools, also quite commonly denoted as the grafters and the reformers. Unimpeachable honesty in public office was so rare in the days of the autocrats that history has carefully noted the names of those men who refused to enrich themselves or to permit others to become enriched at the expense of the state. Joseph in Egypt, Mordecai in Persia and Daniel in Babylon are notable examples of clean men who carried their religion into politics. Mordecai and Daniel at least had a fair share of enemies as the result of their faithfulness. Ever since America cast off the shackles of foreign dominion, establishing a free government of, by and for the people, there has been a constant struggle to keep the government free from the man who looks upon public office as a private snap. In the long run the men who have guided American destinies have been incorruptible men, but her town and county councils and state legislatures and often her school boards have suffered from the practice of unworthy men who were not afraid of dirty dollars.

To some extent this is due to the failure of Christian men to be willing to make the sacrifice involved in accepting public office. We must, however, put religion into politics in two ways. We must strive in every possible way to nominate for public office men of tried and proven Christian character, and inversely we must be sure that we do not nominate men whose characters have been tried and proven false or whose past history labels their fidelity with a question mark. In local affairs partisanship has no place. It makes no difference whether a councilman, a member of the school board or, since senators are directly elected, a member of the state legislature belongs to one party or another. It does make a tremendous difference whether or not the candidate is a good man and can be trusted. In America we are in the habit of electing men to public office, and then leaving them to meet their problems alone. A great many crooked deals would not be put through our councils and our governing boards, and a great many good causes would be served if the good people of the community would exercise their legal right of attendance upon council meetings. There is only one way that religion can be put into politics, and that is for Christian people to enter politics in sufficient numbers to outvote and outmaneuver the forces of evil and self-interest.

The Battle Against Booze

Epworth League Topic. Ezek. 7 : 25; I Cor. 16 : 13-14; Deut. 3 : 22; II Tim. 2 : 3

THE battle against booze began the day after the flood. It has been on with varying fortunes ever since. In the last fifty years booze has gone from defeat to defeat, winning a skirmish now and then, but year by year losing ground. In the last generation the battle has gone repeatedly against John Barleycorn. First insurance companies began to refuse his intimates, then railway companies and great industrial organizations began to discard those who patronized his parlors. State after state and city after city found that it was richer without saloon revenues, and then the war proved that even armies fought better when sober, and war prohibition became a step toward victory. In our own United States so much of the territory has already gone dry that great breweries are now turning their attention to the manufacture of drinks with barley flavor which they advertise as temperance beverages, while the last whisky was legally manufactured before midnight on September 8. The makers of beer and wine continue their plants under the constant threat that food necessities may any day bring prohibition to them. More than that, there is now pending in the Senate of the United States a resolution looking toward a prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution.

It would seem that the battle against booze was all but won, and that is a very dangerous point in any fight, the point at which it is necessary to fight hardest. Any slacking of effort at this time on the part of those opposed to the liquor business will enable it to repair its damaged intrenchments. There can be no compromise with this foe. He is the deadly enemy of youth, opportunity, homes and the state. The command therefore in every Christian camp must be, "Fight on!" Soon it will be "Fix bayonets" for the final charge.

Merry Moments

GENEALOGY OF THE ARKANSAW TRAVELER. A traveler in Ireland, in the midst of a severe storm of wind and rain, found a dilapidated cabin by the wayside and entered. Through numerous cracks and fissures in the wall and roof the flood poured in trickling streams; only one spot of the littered floor was dry, and that was in the corner, where an old coverlet was suspended roofwise, and underneath which sat the owner of the cabin playing a fiddle. He ceased his music as the stranger entered, and offered him a seat by his side beneath the coverlet. "You seem to be musical under difficulties," remarked the traveler, after he had gained the shelter. "Faith, an' I fiddle to keep away the blues," answered Paddy. "Is this cabin yours?" "An' it is, bad scran to it!" "Why don't you patch up the walls and roof, and stop this fearful leaking?" "Och, bedad! would you have a man go out in this storm? The remedy 'ud be worse than the disease." "But," urged the traveler, "why don't you patch it during pleasant weather?" "Why, bless your sowl," exclaimed the host, "in pleasant weather it doesn't lake."

WHAT DID HE EXPECT? Little Robert, aged five, visiting his grandparents, had been saying "Amen" simultaneously with grandpapa at grace before meals. Being curious to hear the whole prayer, Auntie drew her chair close to his one day and listened attentively. She was astonished to hear the following: "Our Father, 'Thou preparedst a table before me in the presence of mine enemies.' Amen."

A LATE SEASON. "Well, boys," said the schoolmaster, as he prepared to take a seat one mild March morning, "I suppose you are all prepared for an early spring?" "Yes, sir," said the small boy, who was invariably blamed for everything, "but I want to tell you I didn't put it on your chair." Then the schoolmaster discovered the bent pin and the spring was postponed.

THE NEWEST THEOLOGY. A boy, at a recent examination in Scripture, was asked where Cain went after he killed Abel. He replied that he went to bed. The teacher wanted to know how he made that out. He said, "It's in the chapter, sir, that Cain, after he had killed Abel, went to the land of Nod."

THE LOGICAL BOOMERANG. "Willie," said the mother sorrowfully, "every time you are naughty I get another gray hair." "Oo!" said Willie, "you must have been a terror. Look at grandpa."—Exchange.

THE DIFFERENCE. A man went into a hotel and left his umbrella in the stand, with a card bearing this inscription attached to it: "This umbrella belongs to a man who can deal a blow of two hundred and fifty pounds' weight." On returning to seek his property, he found in its place a card thus inscribed: "This card was left by a man who can run ten miles an hour. I shall not return."

EXPLAINED. Andrew Carnegie tells of an old Scotchwoman who had no great liking for modern church music. One day she was expressing her dislike of the singing of an anthem in her own church when a friend said: "Why, that anthem is a very ancient one. David sang it to Saul." "Weel, weel!" said the old woman, "I noo for the first time understan' why Saul threw his javelin at David when the lad sang for him."

Words are like the beautiful froth on the milk, but deeds are like the refreshing draught beneath.

RAZORS

Take the Guesswork Out of Razor Buying

A man who is a good judge of a razor is won over instantly by a Genco. On the other hand, a man who has very little knowledge regarding the quality of a razor can purchase a Genco and rest assured that he has made a wise choice. There is no guesswork in buying a Genco Razor. Our 500 master cutlers have ground all the guesswork out of them.

"A Genco must make good or we will"

Every one carries this famous guarantee

Your dealer will be glad to show you Genco Razors because he knows that a Genco is going to give you many years of satisfaction.

If you do not shave yourself—get a Genco Razor and let your barber keep it for your own use. Then you'll always be sure of getting a smooth, clean shave, and it's the only sanitary way, too.

How To Order

If your dealer cannot supply you with a Genco Razor, send us $2.00. If your skin is tender or your beard wiry, better send $3.00 for the heavier, extra full concave Genco. Also ask for our booklet, "A Real Shave," which tells you what you should know about razor making, buying, and handling.

Dealers: We are furnishing every Genco Distributor—absolutely free—one of the beautiful display cases pictured above, in connection with our interesting selling proposition. Write us about it.

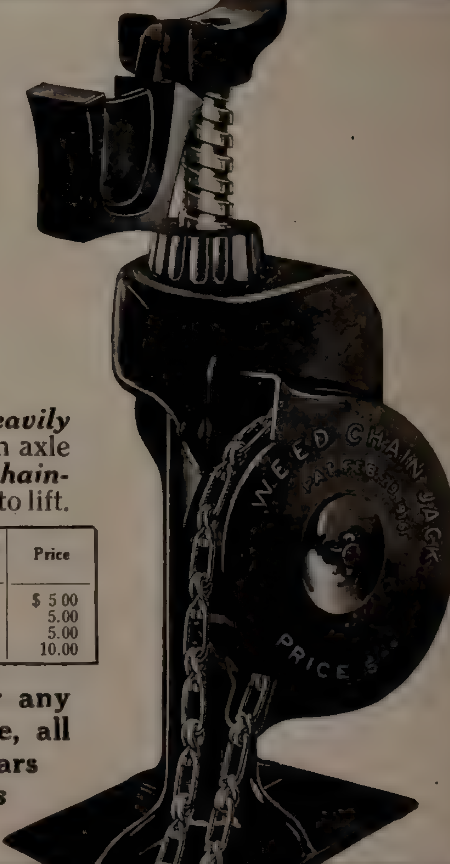
to raise or lower a car with the

Weed Chain-Jack

The Jack That Saves Your Back



Simply a few easy pulls on its chain lifts or lowers the heaviest car while you stand erect—clear from greasy springs, tire carriers and other projections. Up or down—there's no labor.

Never gets out of order. Gears and chain wheel protected by a stamped steel housing. Chain heavily plated to prevent rusting. Has a strong cap, providing the kind of support from which an axle will not slip, while a broad base prevents the jack from upsetting on uneven roads. Every Weed Chain-Jack is submitted to a lifting test and will support over twice the weight it is ever required to lift.

The 8 inch and 10 inch sizes are made with an Auxiliary Step as shown in the accompanying illustration. When in operative position it adds two inches to the height of the jack.

Made in Four Sizes

Size	Height When Lowered	Height When Raised	Height When Raised With Aux. Step Up	Price
8 inch	8 inches	12½ inches	14½ inches	$ 5.00
10 inch	10 inches	15⅜ inches	17⅜ inches	5.00
12 inch	12 inches	18½ inches	No Aux. Step	5.00
12 in. Truck	12 inches	19¼ inches	No Aux. Step	10.00

10 Days' Trial. If your dealer does not have them send us $5.00 for any size for pleasure cars or $10.00 for the Truck size, and we will send you one, all charges prepaid. For delivery in Canada send $6.00 for any size for pleasure cars or $12.00 for the Truck size. Try it 10 days. If not satisfied, return it to us and we will refund your money.

Taking Christ to the Training Camps

By ABBY GUNN BAKER

UNCLE Sam's soldier boys have fairly captured the national capital. This is evident to any one traversing the crowded streets of the city any day of the week, from one Sunday morning to the following Sunday night. For Sunday is the great day of the week in all the army training camps in the vicinity of Washington, and as a result there are more sailors and soldiers abroad in the streets on that day than on all the other days of the week combined. It follows also that Sunday has become the busiest day of the week at the national capital not only for all religious organizations but, unfortunately, for numberless other organizations, whose influence is far from desirable for the man in uniform.

The war has already affected Washington in many ways, more so, perhaps, than any other city in the Union. It has brought about so many changes that, in verity, old things have passed away, even though all things are not new. The old, staid, slow-going village life which has always, more or less, characterized the capital is no more. We have become a city, if not quite overnight, certainly since our country has gone into the great world-war. The wide, stately streets of Washington, which for three generations have been famous for their dignified lack of big crowds and bustle—save at the quadrennial inauguration of the Chief Executive of the nation—have suddenly taken on an activity and a rush of life that fairly makes the oldest inhabitant gasp. It would have been unbelievable seven months ago that the war would have brought from fifty to seventy-five thousand people—civilians, not soldiers—to take up temporary residence in Washington, yet that is a conservative estimate. And when one tries to estimate the crowds which pass through the city, ah! It is those crowds that proclaim unmistakably that our country is at war, for every other man you meet in that passing throng is wearing the khaki, or the smart white suit of the navy.

WHEN the soldiers first began to arrive in Washington last spring for the reserve officers' training camps, and when the District National Guard came back from the Mexican border and were established in camps around the capital, the people of the city began to realize, in a dim kind of way, that there were a good many of the boys in uniform in town, and that something ought to be done for them. Then when the camps for the men of the new American army began to be opened and soldiers by the thousand and tens of thousands poured into the city, the churches of all denominations were stirred with the consciousness that "something ought to be done for the boys," but no one seemed to know how to go about it. There was one organization, however, which showed itself equal to the emergency.

One evening last February a dinner was given at the G Street building of the Young Women's Christian Association in Washington. Among the honor guests was William Knowles Cooper, general secretary of the Washington Y. M. C. A. At the dinner Mr. Cooper told a little group around him at table that he had just come from a conference with certain leading government officials and some of the leading members of the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. "This country will be in the World War within six weeks," he said with solemn emphasis in course of the conversation, "and, thank God, the Y. M. C. A. of the world will be ready for it!"

At the time Mr. Cooper made that statement his hearers could scarcely credit the utterance. Nor did it seem more probable that the Y. M. C. A. could be in a condition to cope with the situation if war should come. Time proved the truth of both prophecies. Within six weeks of the night of the dinner the United States was in the world war, and within a very short time thereafter the Y. M. C. A. proved it was ready for the emergency. With no ostentation, and comparatively little advertising, the International Committee sent out its appeal, and a short time afterward announced that three million dollars had been pledged for the war work. By July this amount had been raised to four million, by September to ten, and when, in the latter part of that month, it was realized that in all human probability a million of our own boys must go to the battle-fields of Europe, and that a tremendous task would confront the Association, the great enterprise was launched to raise thirty-five million dollars for aggressive Y. M. C. A. work in every training-camp and at every battle-front throughout the world.

As soon as the government decided to establish the training-camps and cantonments for the new National Army, the International Committee planned its policy at the front in Europe, and also divided the United States into five great divisions for Y. M. C. A. war work. Thirty-three selected Association secretaries were placed in charge of the preparation for activities in the training-camps. As these camps were established Association buildings were erected. More than a hundred of these buildings have been put up, and some forty buildings already on the grounds are being utilized by the Association with government permission. Fully five hundred men, largely Association secretaries, will be at work in these camps and at the front in France by the time these words are in print.

FROM the first the government has given the Y. M. C. A. hearty cooperation; but there was an impelling force behind this which traces back to the mothers of the country. When it was decided that the army was to be drafted, and that every home was to be called to give up its sons, there came a cry from the united Motherhood of the land which the government could not ignore. "You tell us that you are going to draft our sons for this awful world war," these mothers said in effect. "Very well. We are patriots too, and we will not hold them back. But there is one proviso which must be made. From the battle-fields of France, and from the homes of Canada, we have heard horrible stories of a leprosy of sin that, to our view, far outstrips the horrors of war. We saw what happened to some of our own boys on the Mexican border last year, and in some of the training-camps. We, the mothers of America, demand that in the new army our boys be protected from those horrors, or we will be driven to say with that French mother who had seen her son seared and soiled with sin, and who in her agony declared she could never forgive her government—yea, verily, if our sons are not protected, we shall never forgive our government."

The appeal was not lost. Not only did President Wilson put the government back of the Y. M. C. A., but he created the Commission on Training Camp Activities to help provide wholesome recreation for the men in the camps, and to help safeguard them from unwholesome influence. Mr. Raymond Fosdick, the national chairman, has headquarters in Washington, and has a well developed network of helpers in every town near the sixteen great cantonments. The specific purpose of the Commission is to keep the Secretary of War informed as to conditions about the training-camps, to cooperate with the Y. M. C. A. and other organizations in providing recreation for the soldiers, and to see that efforts in this direction do not overlap. The work of Mr. Fosdick's commission is bringing in good results.

WASHINGTON is always full of soldiers and sailors, but their numbers fluctuate. During all the hot summer days, they kept coming and going. Fort Myer, the crack post of the army, became a reserve officers' training camp in the spring, with twenty-five hundred young men in training as officers of the new army. Out on the hills north of Washington is the American University Park camp, where four thousand recruits in the engineer corps of the regular army came into camp in the early summer. All of those men are somewhere in France now. A regiment or two of foresters succeeded them, and they in turn were succeeded by the regiments of railroad men. All of them, of both branches, are now at the front. This camp is again filled with engineers—young fellows who are learning how to build the protective trenches, field bridges, and other appliances of modern warfare. This camp is so large that, in addition to the miles of long, low cantonments which house the soldiers, there are great fields covered with white army tents. At Belvoir, a few miles below Mount Vernon, is another encampment of engineers, and at St. Asaph, near old Alexandria, Va., is the field artillery, where from two to six thousand soldiers, with horses and guns, are usually encamped. There are from six to eight smaller camps within the environs of the city, while at Annapolis Junction, about twenty miles east, is one of the sixteen army cantonments, Camp Meade, where from forty to sixty thousand soldiers will be stationed until they are ready to be sent to the front. The number fluctuates in all these camps, but it is safe to estimate that there will be an average of one hundred thousand soldiers within the vicinity of Washington during the time of the war. Added to this is the huge army of civilians which the war has brought here. Is it any wonder that the Washington churches are almost staggered with the task that confronts them?

On the whole, however, the national capital is meeting the situation zealously and generously. The women of the city have taken up the work of the Red Cross with fine and persistent enthusiasm. The Soldiers' Welfare and the Automobile Committees, under Mrs. Borden Harriman, have been untiring. The Red Cross District Committee has units at work in all parts of the city. Calvary Baptist Church unit combines several churches of various denominations in one neighborhood, and, under the leadership of Mrs. P. H. Bristow, has made, during the summer and fall, thousands of garments, sheets and pillowcases, surgeons' jackets, pajamas, and innumerable knitted and hospital articles. The Church of the Covenant, Presbyterian, has led in distinctive work for the soldiers. It has a war service force which includes three war assistant pastors, and a clerical force of a half dozen laymen and women. The regular assistant pastor, Rev. John Carruthers, has accomplished wonders in directing the work. Each Saturday evening the church is thrown open for a social for soldiers, where Mrs. Marshall and several of the Cabinet women receive, and Mrs. Baker, the wife of the War Secretary, sings for the soldiers. Many of the churches are opening on Saturday evenings in this manner, and many of them are organizing war service committees.

Mrs. Borden Harriman and her committee of automobile drivers

BUT it is the Y. M. C. A. secretaries and the ministers who are at work in the army camps who are doing the greatest service of all for our soldier boys. Every Y. M. C. A. building in the army camps is equipped with long desks, which are provided with unlimited quantities of stationery. These desks are always crowded in the evenings by the boys who are writing home. There is a piano in each building, and usually a phonograph, and always a moving picture equipment, which is the favorite form of amusement. There is a well-stocked set of book-shelves, too, and magazines and newspapers aplenty. In some of the camps there are savings-banks in connection with the camp post-office. In one of the Washington camps, on a recent pay-day, the secretaries sent more than four thousand dollars home for the soldiers through the camp savings-bank.

Every Wednesday morning, the war camp Y. M. C. A. secretaries and ministerial workers of the camps—usually twenty-five or thirty—meet in Y. M. C. A. headquarters at Washington for prayer and conference. At noon some one of the Washington churches entertains them at luncheon, where a group of the leading church members welcome them and listen to after-lunch addresses by the camp workers. In this way the churches are being brought into close touch with the camps, and are learning at first hand to take up the work.

At one of these lunches recently, Dr. Rev. Arthur Bradford, who was delegated by his church at Montclair, N. J., for three months' service at Fort Myer, told of his work. "You know," said he, "that part of my duties are to sell postage-stamps in the evenings to the soldiers. Now that doesn't seem a work of much significance; and yet a homesick boy came to the counter the other evening and, after a few words together, we went out under the starry skies of the night, and that homesick boy was led to pledge his life to the Lord Jesus. So you see that even selling stamps may lead to great results."

SAID William Knowles Cooper at another of these lunches: "What we want our secretaries to realize, and what we want the Christians in Washington to realize, is that the soldiers—these boys who have gone out from our homes to go into this awful world war—fully know what they have gone into, and every one of them wants our help. They want help in the hardest battle they have got to fight—the battle against self. They want help to know God and the future life. One of them graphically expressed it to me the other evening in a little confidential talk we were having together. 'I tell you,' he said, 'I want to know where I am going when I come to die.'"

And to help the soldier boys in the terrible battle against sin and self, as well as to help them to know the life eternal, is surely the task which not only faces the Y. M. C. A. workers in the army camps and the churches of Washington, but the Christian people of America from one ocean to the other.

What Shall We Eat?

THE Food Administration at Washington issues daily reports on the food situation. It points out that there is twice as much nutritive value in a dollar's worth of corn meal as in a dollar's worth of wheat bread. There are four bushels of corn raised in this country to every bushel of wheat, and corn meal is as good food for man as wheat. It costs less, and is the richest crop in our country. The corn crop for 1917 in the United States is estimated at 3,191,000,000 bushels. The 1916 crop was 2,583,241,000 bushels. One pound less of wheat flour a week per person in the United States would save 133,000,000 bushels of wheat for our armies.

Buckwheat cakes in plenty for the coming winter are promised from Canada. The buckwheat crop there is one of the best in recent years. Buckwheat has a considerable part to play as a substitute for wheat.

This is a short year for wheat and a good one for potatoes. On the average a baked potato equals a slice of wheat bread as food. In October and November all the wholesale and retail grocers will be asked to urge on consumers the wisdom of storing potatoes to carry them over winter. By storing, it is easy to keep such vegetables as beets, carrots, cabbage, celery, dry beans, dry lima beans, onions, parsnips, potatoes, sweet potatoes. With the exception of beans and turnips, these crops may be stored in the cellar, in pits or banks, or in caves and outdoor cellars. Pits or banks should be made in a well-drained location. An excavation eight or ten inches deep and of suitable size should be made. This is lined with straw or leaves and the vegetables placed in a conical pile on this material. The vegetables are then covered with straw and then earth, the depth depending on the severity of the winter. The pits may be covered with additional straw, corn husks or leaves during severe weather. The outdoor cellar or cave is more satisfactory, but the expense is greater. Beans may be kept in dry places, such as the attic or pantry. Now is the time to care for these crops so that they may be available during winter and spring.

THE administration is engaged in an investigation of milk production and distribution. The very high price of feed has borne on dairymen, but there are reasons to expect lower feed prices later.

Growing children need whole milk, but grown people can drink skim milk, which is as rich in protein and mineral matter as whole milk. For the sake of the babies and children, we must not waste a drop of milk. A quart of milk gives as much energy as eleven ounces of sirloin steak or eight and a half eggs. Drink skim milk, if an adult, and use it in cooking. Make cottage cheese of the sour milk. Cottage cheese is one of the best foods.

One ounce of sugar less a day would not be much of a sacrifice, but it would mean much of a saving. One ounce less a day would save 1,185,000 tons a year, and that would keep sugar plentiful and cheap.

The Food Administration has compiled a chart of the fish of the United States. The number of fish that can be used for food is astonishing; the public knows only a few varieties and neglects many which are as wholesome and cheaper. In consumption of fish we stand far behind some of the other nations. Our average is 18 pounds. The United Kingdom eats 65 pounds yearly per capita; Canada, 57 pounds; Sweden, 52 pounds; Norway, 44 pounds; Denmark, 39 pounds; Portugal, 37 pounds. Our sea food is divided into four classes. First, migratory fish, found in the coastwise waters, or in sounds and bays. There are more than fifty varieties in this group, but the principal sales center on two: bluefish and mackerel. The second group is the ground-fish varieties, which inhabit the bottom and are captured on fishing-banks or grounds. The public knows chiefly two varieties of ground-fish, cod and halibut, but there are a dozen other varieties. Crustaceans, such as crabs and lobsters, and shell-fish, such as oysters and clams, make up the other two groups. Fresh-water fish, of which only two or three varieties are generally used, such as whitefish and trout, make up a group of fully three dozen, all wholesome food and all available in our market.

Firms engaged in the manufacture of paper cans and containers have been in conference with the Food Administration discussing the possibilities of substituting fibre or paper as a material for containers usually made of tin. The shortage of tin plate is a serious matter, as there is a great demand for tin at the front, and in this country it must be used for canning perishable food products. Paper containers can be used for such commodities as coffee, tea, tobacco, toilet powders, etc.

Mobilizing the Rubber Industry

What Akron's Great Factories Are Doing for the Army and Navy—By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1917, by Frank G. Carpenter

SINCE the outbreak of the great war in Europe, the little city of Akron has become one of the important manufacturing centers of the world. It is the chief rubber city of the United States. It manufactures more than half of all the rubber goods made in this country and more than one-third of all the rubber made by the world. Just now it is engaged in making rubber supplies for the army and navy, and its twenty-five factories have been speeded up by the demands of the nation. Rubber is estimated by the officials here as the third great necessity to our armies in Europe. The first necessity is food for the soldiers, the second is guns and ammunition to fight the battles, and the third is rubber, which has to do not only with transportation, but with nearly every other branch of modern warfare.

Take the matter of tires. During my trip through the great plants here I have found nearly every one of them making more or less tires for the army, and the total output for this year will be about 20,000,000. There is one company which makes nothing but tires. It is now turning out 16,000 a day, and is building additions to its plant which will make its production 25,000 tires daily. This company manufactures tires of all kinds, from those of the motorcycle used by the scouts to the great trucks which require tires fourteen inches wide and strong enough to carry the heaviest loads.

The demand for tires is far beyond the supply. They are among the greatest of military necessities, and they are eaten up with the hardest of usage. Even the solid tires seldom average more than 2,000 miles, and this is less than one-tenth of what is expected of them for ordinary commercial purposes. It is estimated that the Allies now have in the neighborhood of 450,000 motor vehicles of one kind or another, and that these machines use several times as many tires as would be consumed under peace conditions. At four tires to the machine, this means that something like 1,800,000 tires are now being used, and this does not include the increased demands now that we are to put an enormous army in Europe. We shall have not only to supply our own tires, but to aid in keeping the vehicles used by our allies in good condition.

AS to the demands of the United States troops in Europe, it is estimated that we shall need at least 100,000 motor trucks for the transportation of our guns and supplies, and that the first army of a million men will require 40,000 trucks, which means 160,000 tires. These tires are now being made here and at the many other rubber centers of the United States. They will be shipped to the establishments making the trucks, and as soon as possible the business will be standardized and the tires shipped directly to Europe, to be used there as the wear and tear of the service demand.

In addition to the trucks we shall have to keep up in the neighborhood of 200,000 other motor vehicles, including cars of various kinds, hospital ambulances and motorcycles. The British army is now using about 100,000 motorcycles, and some of them are equipped with side cars after the fashion of the little boatlike car used with our motorcycles, which has facetiously been dubbed the "wife-killer." These side cars are mounted with machine guns, and the weight of the guns rests upon the rubber tires.

One of the plants I visited was making tires for airplanes. These will be shipped to the various aviation factories and will be used for our flying machines abroad. One of the largest factories here has been making such tires for the French aerial fleets, which are using annually something like 30,000 machines. It is estimated that we shall need more than 100,000 machines every year in order to maintain our force of 20,000 aviators, and the work is now going on in making the tires for the airplanes under construction. Each airplane has two little wheels upon which it alights when it comes down from the skies. These wheels have to be equipped with the strongest rubber in order to absorb the shock and soften the landing. The very best of Para rubber is used for the purpose, and that of a nature so springy that an airplane will bounce from thirty to sixty feet into the air on striking the earth.

SPEAKING of rubber for use in the air, two of the biggest factories here are making dirigible balloons for scouting along the shores and for some distance out at sea. These balloons are enormous gas-bags of the very best rubber. The larger ones are more than a hundred feet in circumference and a hundred and seventy-five feet long. They carry wireless apparatus, and are of great use in detecting submarines that come near the coast. They are similar to what the British call "blimps."

Some of the blimps are already in use, and it is said that we shall need three hundred for our home service alone. These balloons are equipped with pontoons which enable them to settle upon the water. Other dirigibles when not inflated can be squeezed into a small compass and can easily be shipped to any point where they are needed. And then there are the kite balloons and captive observational balloons which are in use among the armies abroad and which we shall have to supply for our force in the field. Some of these dirigible balloons must be able to fly thirty-five miles an hour and that at a height of six thousand feet. They are to be built for the navy. They are testing these balloons somewhere in Ohio, and they have a school there for teaching men to fly them. This school is presided over by Ralph H. Upson, who will be remembered as having won the last James Gordon Bennett balloon trophy race before the war began. Some of the largest of these dirigible balloons cost as much as $50,000 each.

It would take a column of this magazine to print even the names of the different kinds of rubber goods that are now being made for the army. In one of the large establishments here I saw hundreds of men and women making boots and shoes for the men in the trenches, and in another place they were making rubber slickers and ponchos. The trenches are often full of water, and hip boots are a part of the soldier's equipment. Some of the men wear rubber stockings, between woolen and cotton ones, and some of the officers have rubber sheets upon which they sleep to keep out of the wet. Every man we send to Europe will have to have a rubber coat or slicker, and the rubber shoes and boots required will be numbered by millions. In one of the factories here I saw them vulcanizing hundreds of pairs of boots at one time. The boots were on steel frames which were about two feet taller than the workmen who pushed them into the great iron ovens or retorts, lined with iron pipes, where this was accomplished. A touch of a button dropped the steel door of the oven, when the steam was turned on and the vulcanization began.

BUT before I go farther, let me tell you something as to how the crude rubber is turned into the manufactured rubber of commerce. The first rubber manufactures were in the shape of balls, which Columbus found used by the Indians on the West India Islands shortly after he discovered America. A little later Cortez was taught by the Aztecs in Mexico to spread it over the coats of his soldiers to keep out the rain, and about twenty-six years before our Declaration of Independence a Frenchman brought some of the juice of the rubber tree from Ecuador to Europe in the shape of rude bottles. The first manufacture of rubber by civilized man was Straining at its tether, this dirigible balloon is as anxious to go as a colt just broken by Dr. Joseph Priestley, an English scientist, who came to the United States while George Washington was President. Dr. Priestley made the first rubber erasers. They were cubes much smaller than the kind we now buy for a nickel. They were half an inch long and sold for 75 cents.

The first waterproof cloth was made by an Englishman in 1797, about the time that John Adams was inaugurated President of the United States, but it would not stand the heat, and it was not until the presidency of John Quincy Adams that Charles Mackintosh, a Scotchman, discovered how to dissolve rubber in naphtha, and make a liquid which, spread upon cloth, caused it to shed water. That was the birth of the slicker and the rubber coats of all kinds that our men will wear in the field.

The greatest of all rubber inventions, however, was made by an American. This was Charles Goodyear, who discovered the process of vulcanization. Goodyear was a Connecticut Yankee, who began life as a hardware man. He became interested in the study of rubber, and when he saw some shoes made of the pure gum, which had been imported from Brazil, he conceived the idea of making something of the kind for the trade. He used pure gum, which was then cheap, but the shoes softened during the summer and gave out a bad odor. Goodyear tried to harden the rubber by treating its surface with nitric acid, and he was able to improve it thereby. He then tried mixing it with sulphur, but the process was not a success, until one day, when he was baking a mixture of sulphur and rubber on his kitchen stove, some of the gum fell out upon a hot iron. Instead of melting, the stuff hardened like leather, and he discovered that great heat would make rubber hard. He took the rubber outside and nailed it to the wall of the house to see whether it would stand the cold. There was a frost that night, but the next morning the piece of rubber was as elastic as ever, and it had none of the brittleness of the cold rubber he had previously made. He then went on until he learned just how the gum should be treated and the amount of heat needed for vulcanization. He took out his first patent in 1844, and upon that patent has grown the great rubber industry of today. Various improvements have been added to make vulcanized rubber soft, and we have it in various shapes.

I WISH I could take you over one of these big rubber factories and show you the many processes through which the crude rubber goes before it comes out in rubber gloves, automobile tires, diving suits and the thousand other shapes in which it is used by the consumer. The establishments are enormous. They have hundreds of acres of floor space and there are three each of which employs in the neighborhood of fifteen thousand men and women. I went through one of the largest, touching only the high spots. The time spent was several hours, and my trip was a Sabbath Day's journey, or as far as from Bethlehem to Jerusalem. In one room, covering an acre, I saw hundreds of spindles moving around like those of a great cotton mill. They were making insulated wire for telephone and telegraph use and for various kinds of electrical machines. In other places they were making rubber gloves to be used by electricians while handling live wires, and in others insulators for wireless outfits, and rubber packing for the periscopes of the submarines. The very torpedoes that are shot by the submarines have rubber arrangements which control their depth in the water, and rubber is also used in laying the submarine mines. The crews of our submarines have rubber boots, hats and oversuits, and they have escape helmets which contain a great deal of rubber.

In one part of the factory they were making rubber sheets, which will be sent out as a part of the Red Cross supplies, and rubber operating aprons to be used by the doctors. The government is now asking for something like thirty thousand doctors to go to France, and each of these must have an extensive rubber equipment, including tools that are largely made of rubber. We have already six base hospitals in France and these have in the neighborhood of ten thousand beds. The patients in them need hot-water bags, ice bags and rubber pillows and mattresses. The nurses use rubber gloves and the attendants have rubber-tired wheelbarrows for carrying the patients. All of these supplies will be enormously increased when our great army has gone to the field.

Every hot-water bottle is tested before it goes to our hospitals in France

IN going through the factory described, I started at the basement, where there were acres of rooms filled with rubber as it comes from the plantations, and I followed the rubber hams and crêpe rubber through their many processes into goods of one kind or another. The first process is softening the rubber and crushing the lumps between great corrugated rollers of steel. The softening is done in vats of hot water. Then comes the crushing, which brings the rubber out in great sheets. It is next washed by streams of running water until all the dirt and grit are removed, and then rolled out into thin, porous sheets. It is moved back and forth between the rollers, kneaded and worked over and over and mixed with a binding material, so that when it is finished it is in rubber sheets about a quarter of an inch thick, and it may be white, black or red, according to the coloring matter that is mixed with it. The necessary sulphur is then added for vulcanization, and it is treated with other ingredients, according to the kind of product desired.

In the making of tires, a mixture of cloth or cord is used to build up the fabric, each factory having its own methods of manipulation and construction. The cotton employed must be of the very best and of the longest staple, and thousands of bales are consumed in this way every year. We import a great deal of Egyptian cotton for the purpose, and there is one company here which has its own plantations in Arizona and is raising cotton there. The amount planted this year was more than 10,000 acres. Another company has a cotton mill of its own. It wants to experiment and will take the cotton from its own fields into its own mill and make its own tire fabric. This new cotton mill is in New England, not far from Providence, R. I. It already employs 1,200 hands.

The rubber industry has made Akron one of the boom towns of the United States. There is no special reason for it except the enterprise, push and brains of the men at the head of the business. The city is thousands of miles from where the rubber trees grow. It has no waterways to connect it with the ocean, and the raw material and the manufactured goods have to pay heavy freights coming and going. Nevertheless the output is something like $225,000,000 a year and 65,000 men and women are kept employed making nothing but rubber. They get the highest of wages. The lowest paid hands, when undergoing their apprenticeship, get thirty-two cents an hour, and the factory payrolls now amount to more than $40,000,000 a year. The capitalization of the various rubber companies is about $200,000,000.

All this has made Akron grow faster than the gourd that shaded the prophet Jonah. Seven years ago it had less than 70,000 people. It has now about 120,000 and there are not enough homes to house all the workmen. The various rubber companies and real estate companies are remedying this as fast as possible. Each of the large companies has some plans to better the sanitary conditions and lives of its men. A great deal of industrial service work is going on. The men are saving money and 50 per cent. of them now own their own homes. One company is building 1,500 houses. Another has a plan by which its employees have become stockholders and share in the profits of the business, and nearly every establishment does more or less welfare work for its employees. Indeed, I know of no place where the labor seems to be more contented, and is more universally prosperous.

I FIND also a high degree of patriotism exhibited in connection with the war, both on the part of the companies and of the men in their employ. The larger factories have subscribed extensively to the Liberty Loan, a big percentage of the men buying the bonds on the instalment plan. The companies are working together and assisting each other to get out the war orders. Shortly after our declaration of war one of the largest of the plants here was asked to supply thousands of a certain article, the name of which I am not permitted to give, within seven days, in order that they might be given to General Pershing's army when it started to Europe. The article had never been made in this country, but the factory took the patterns and turned out the order within six days, although it had to shut down five of its busiest departments to do so. A few weeks later the government sent out an order for several hundred thousand of the same article, distributing it among a number of factories in order that no partiality might be shown. The company that filled the first order not only did not object to this, but it sent its skilled workmen and specialists to aid its competitors in starting their work on the government orders.

I have talked with officials of the chief plants here. They tell me that the rubber industry is mobilized and that it will work together throughout the war. They say that there will be no famine in rubber and that the world supply will be ample for ourselves and our allies. They say that the crude rubber is practically controlled outside of Germany and, that the industrial plants we now have are large enough to satisfy every demand. There will be no increase of prices as to most materials, and all other work will be set aside, if necessary, to supply government orders.

The Bowery Mission in War Time

By REV. JOHN G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent

NEVER perhaps in the history of cities has there been a street which has so persistently kept itself at the focus point of interest in the eyes of the world as has the Bowery of New York City. Changes have taken place in its appearance and character, changes radical, drastic, and striking, but it still continues "the Bowery," unlike any other street in the world. Its salient characteristics have frequently undergone a complete metamorphosis. During the last twenty years it has been wonderfully cleaned up, both physically and morally; so much so that many of its tradesmen grew ambitious two years ago to have its name changed. But that was a much too iconoclastic step for the city fathers, so it still remains "the Bowery."

The Bowery today is probably the biggest clearing-house for unskilled labor in the country. The war, the munitions trade with all its allied industries, factories, mines, shipbuilding and railroading, have created such a demand for men that the big employers of labor are actually seeking their supplies of toilers from this street, which was believed a few years ago to be populated by men who would not work. There are between twenty and thirty labor agencies now carrying on business on the Bowery who are trafficking in unskilled labor. For many years the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau and the employment agency of the Bowery Branch of the Y. M. C. A. were the only two such agencies at work. Passing these recently opened places you see alluring signs hung out, such as: "We are shipping men to Erie, Pa. at 4 P.M. today. Wages $2.75 per day. Transportation free." "Men wanted in the Maine woods at $3 per day." Men stand at the door ("barkers" they are termed in the vernacular) endeavoring by verbal eloquence to produce what the flaming bulletins fail to accomplish. They are absolutely unscrupulous in their promises. Poor, ignorant men, especially foreigners, are often grossly deceived. They often find themselves quickly in a distant state. Sure enough, there is employment, but the sleeping accommodation is not fit for cattle, the commissariat utterly insufficient, and the charges for board, lodging, and clothing so outrageous that frequently after working hard for weeks a man is unable to meet them. Alarmingly suspicious is the sign that is sometimes seen, "None but foreigners or colored men need apply."

Strange it may seem, but it is certainly true, that never in its history could the Bowery be more truthfully described as the abode of homeless men than today. The fact is, there is a sieve-like process going on with this mass of unskilled labor. The young, strong and able-bodied men are sifted out. What we have left on the Bowery at the present time is the inefficient, unemployable residuum.

In the readjustment of the Bowery Mission to the changed conditions, therefore, its work is more than ever Christ-like, for it is indeed "seeking and saving the lost." These poor helpless human sheep, far more sinned against than sinning, are by no means worthless even from an economic point of view. That is proved by the work accomplished this summer at the Labor Settlement and the Farm. The work at these places has been accomplished entirely by men who have been emphatically declared to be useless. Notwithstanding the feverish clamor for

Fishing Swamp Becomes Glorious Wheat Field

WHEAT enough to furnish bread for 400,000 people for one year was harvested just outside the city of Sacramento the other day from a piece of land in the Natomas Reclamation District on which, three years ago, young Sacramento diverted itself with the entertaining sport of catching and spearing fish. The land from which this crop was taken was formerly flooded five months of the year, but was reclaimed by the erection of impregnable levees. The work cost about $3,000,000—less than the price of a battleship—and added 50,000 acres of rich sediment to California's productive area. This year's yield is estimated at nearly $4,000,000, more than the cost of the redemption of the swamp. The mammoth crop was gathered by seven combined harvesters operated by great traction engines of the type from which the European "tanks" were evolved, accompanied by auxiliaries in the form of oil and water wagons, carrying drink and fuel for the steel monsters. Fifty tank wagons took away the grain as it poured from the great bins that each harvester carried on its shoulder. Each harvester cut a swath of thirty-five feet. As they rolled their way through the golden grain they mowed a pathway two hundred and forty-five feet wide. The work started shortly after sunrise. Before sunset the grain from seven hundred acres had been gathered and was on its way in barges down the Sacramento River to be ground into flour. This agricultural feat is a wonderful and beautiful illustration of the complete transformation that the Gospel of Christ makes in the desert places of the individual heart and the dismal swamps of human society. The prophet thus describes this reclamation in spiritual agriculture: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose." (Isa. 35 : 1).

1,000,000 Homeless by Floods

THE city of Tientsin, China, is threatened with destruction by flood. The Chinese city and portions of all the foreign concessions are under water, which is rising rapidly. It covers the great plain to the southeast of Peking. It is estimated that 1,000,000 Chinese are homeless. The railway embankment between Tientsin and Nanking has been cut to permit the water to escape. The Hoangho overflow has broken the Grand Canal at many places. The mud walls protecting Tientsin are being strengthened, but all the streams in Chili Province are feeding the flood in their rush for the sea, making the situation exceedingly serious. Earlier than the earliest Chinese record the Hoangho overflowed the district now under water. Men accept a risk in building their cities on the banks of dangerous rivers, and with the improvements of science wall out the waters and secure safety. There are floods in the moral and spiritual world that throw down the structure of character and have to be guarded against. Christ thus refers to these disastrous floods and to the necessity of providing against their damage. "And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not." (Matt. 7 : 25.)

A Famous Old Yacht

THE other day a yacht club in Marblehead, Mass., bought the famous schooner yacht America to save her from the scrap heap, and it is said to intend to set her apart as a museum. She was built sixty-six years ago for some New York gentlemen, and in a race around the Isle of Wight won the Royal Yacht Squadron cup. She so beat the other seventeen craft that Queen Victoria went aboard of her and complimented those responsible for the victory. She was in the service of the Civil War as a privateer, lay at the bottom of the St. Johns River in Florida, and was used as a training ship at Annapolis. Since 1870 she has been the property of the family of Benjamin F. Butler. We have ships of commerce and ships of war; by all means let us have this ship of sentiment. We are sailing the sea of life in ships which, like those of wood, grow old and worn out; but our ships will be renewed, and when they shall pass across the bar out into the great sea, they will sail for the harbor on the other side, where there will be no more storms. "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil." (Heb. 6 : 19.)

$200,000 Turquoises Stolen

TURQUOISES valued at $200,000, owned by Right Hon. Hayozoun Hohannes Topakyan, Persian Consul-General in New York, were stolen from his strong box in one of the exhibition rooms of the Persian Court studio the other night. A twelfth century vase valued at $3,000 was also taken. The things stolen were the joint property of Mr. Topakyan and an associate who is now in Europe. The Consul-General said: "Shortly after my arrival at the studio from my home in Morris Plains, N. J., I had occasion to visit the exhibition room, and immediately missed the vase, which I had seen in its place the night before. Wondering if anything else were missing, I went into the closet and looked under the rugs for my strong box containing my turquoises, and found it was gone." The surprise is not that the gems are gone, but that they had not been taken sooner. Had he known this country and New York as well as those who live there, he would have put his strong box in a safety deposit vault, for there are said to be thirty burglaries a day in the metropolis, and there are thieves with effrontery and dexterity enough to take a diamond out of a man's shirtfront without his knowing it. The Jewish law was severe on thieves. It required restitution of the burglar. "If a man shall deliver unto his neighbor money or stuff to keep, and it be stolen out of the man's house; if the thief be found, let him pay double." (Ex. 22 : 7.)

The Great New South

AT the National Exposition of Chemical Industries in the Grand Central Palace in New York recently, a day was devoted to the topic, "National Resources for Chemical and Allied Industries." In the symposium C. H. Crawford, assistant to the president of the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis Railroad, lauded the new South, and said that it was nature's greatest undeveloped asset. He said that the value of its cotton crop this year was equal to all the gold dug out of California in the best fifty years of its mining experience, and that when its mountains should be properly opened they would yield as great a return to the miner as the rich soil to the farmer. In the past decade or two it is claimed that the progress of the Southern states has been far in advance of that of any other section. Freed from negro slavery and the more diabolical slavery of the saloon, it has risen as by magic into the stature of a giant in industry, thrift, and civilization. Of their land they might repeat these words of old: "The Lord hath not dealt so with any nation." (Ps. 147 : 20.)

Texas Governor Impeached

ADJUDGED guilty by the State Senate on ten of twenty-one counts, Governor James E. Ferguson of Texas has just been removed from office and William P. Hobby, an editor of Beaumont, who has been acting governor during the impeachment proceedings, has assumed full gubernatorial powers. Only four senators out of thirty-one voted in the governor's favor. One of the specific charges was that he stole $500 from the state, which was sustained by the evidence. This alone would have been sufficient to depose him, but there were nine other charges in the indictment. Texas is a great state, and Governor Ferguson has been considered by many of the best people a black blot on her civilization. He was the champion of the rum forces of the state in the wet and dry campaigns. It is a pitiful thing to see a man of ability and of good family, with opportunity and responsibility like Governor Ferguson's, go wrong, disgracing his office and destroying himself. It would be fortunate if there were everywhere such public virtue in revolt against political corruption as the people of Texas have manifested in ridding themselves of their bad leaders. This advice of the prophet is appropriate to the office holder: "Hate the evil, and love the good, and establish judgment in the gate." (Amos 5 : 15.)

New Vegetables for Food

ONE of the projects of the National Research Council is to find wild food plants not usually eaten to take the place of the more costly cereals in this time of food stress. At the time of the Civil War, Dr. John Parcher, a Southerner, printed a catalogue of natural plants that could be substituted for the more costly grains, and the American Botanist of Joliet, Ill., now proposes to collect for information and use a list of such edible fruits, seeds, roots, nuts, etc. Hunters, trappers, woodsmen, Indians and others are expected to aid in this search. The food quality of wild herbs is indicated at the time the curse fell upon our first parents. "And thou shalt eat the herb of the field." (Gen. 3 : 18.)

Three Great Gospel Commands

*A SERMON BY REV. EDGAR DEWITT JONES, D.D.

TEXTS—"Come unto me, all ye that labor." Matt. 11 : 28. "Tarry ye in the city, until ye be clothed with power from on high." Luke 24 : 49. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel." Mark 16 : 15.

THESE familiar passages of Scripture contain what I believe to be the three great verbs of the Gospel. It is an interesting fact that a single word may embody the very gist of a proposition or a doctrine. Sometimes these significant terms are called key words, and the phrase is apt, for they unlock treasure chambers and open doors to rich discoveries. Certain portions of the New Testament are characterized by the use of a word or words peculiar to the writer. Thus in the Gospel of John the words "love," "life," and "light" are used with much felicity and freighted with a new meaning. The key word of Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians is that of "unity," while that of the little Epistle of Jude is "keep" or "kept."

The study of the parts of speech is of itself fascinating. Verbs are the very life-blood of language, since they describe action either being or stated. According to one spiritual teacher, the three great verbs of life are "to know," "to do," and "to be." That is well summarized, and it is profitable to remember that Jesus taught that, in order to know the doctrine of God, we have but to do his will, and in doing his will we come to be like him, our Lord and Saviour.

There are three great verbs of the Christian life.

THE first of these is "COME." Six hundred and forty-two times the word "come" occurs in the Holy Scriptures. But the use of the word which interests us especially is Christ's "come," and the most precious of all the verses in which Jesus' "come" is found is that recorded by Matthew: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Come"—this was Jesus' word to his disciples, calling them away from their former activities to him and a new life; "come"—this was his word to John and James, to Peter and Andrew, calling them away from their boats and nets to become fishers of men; "come"—this was his word to Matthew Levi sitting at the seat of customs; "come"—this was his word to Zaccheus the publican, to the rich young ruler, to every one of the Twelve disciples, to the Seventy; and on the great day of Pentecost and ever since his word to all humanity is, "Come unto me."

Come. This is the initial act, the first approach to a life companionship with the Saviour. The process of this coming is usually spoken of as "conversion"; sometimes, and inaccurately, as "joining the church." The process of this coming, as recorded in the book of Acts, indicated in the Gospels, and alluded to in the Epistles, is by way of faith and penitence, and by confession in word of mouth, and by baptism. This experience of coming to Christ is epochal in the lives of men and women, and few there are who can ever forget the day and hour that they responded to the Gospel invitation. The manner of the coming may differ, but the experience is one and the same. Some there are who came in the simplicity and quiet of a rural church, some amid the enthusiasm and deeply stirred emotions of a great revival. Some came as little children, unacquainted with sin; some from the depths of despair, having paid the sure wages of sin. And some came in the full splendor of young manhood and young womanhood, and others—but not many—in the twilight years and bent with the burden of old age. Some of us can never forget the hymns of invitation that were sung when we came to Christ: "Just as I am, without one plea." or "Jesus, I my cross have taken," or "He leadeth me, O blessed thought." To a multitude the melting service in which they came to Christ—the sermon, the hymns, the warm handclasps—are a vivid and precious memory.

In a church at Copenhagen stands the famous statue by Thorwaldsen, picturing in marble the world's Saviour in the very act of extending the invitation, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." A great scholar came from afar to see this statue and surveyed it critically. What he saw did not seem to satisfy him. A little child, noticing his disappointed face, made bold to address him. "You must go close to it, sir. You must kneel down and look up into the face." The stranger followed the advice of the child, and kneeling there was rewarded by a view of the sculptured face of the Christ so melting in tenderness that it greatly touched his heart. Ah, how impossible it is to come to Christ with pride and the spirit of haughtiness! "Except ye turn and become as little children," said Jesus, "ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." "Come"—this is the first great verb of the Gospel. The invitation is from the Saviour himself, and it is extended to all who have not yet made him the Christ of their souls.

THE second great verb of the Christian life is "TARRY." Having called his disciples to him, Jesus' next word to them was to abide with him, to tarry, to remain, for a season at his side. First, they were called to him; secondly, they were bidden to tarry with him. And the three years they tarried in the company of Jesus he prepared them for their work. They were in training, so to speak. They were going to school to the Master of them all. The tarrying process is that of learning. "Come unto me," said Jesus, "all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Take my yoke and learn of me." The disciples tarried with Christ that they might learn of him. One must of necessity be a learner before he can become a teacher. Before one can give out anything he has to be filled. Communion precedes communication. When the Twelve were called to Jesus that they might learn of him, they were not remarkably promising teachers; they were empty, but Christ filled them; they were ignorant, but he taught them; they were weak, he made them strong; they were wavering, he made them stable. It is not enough to come in the great, initial act of allegiance to Christ; but having come, one must needs tarry and learn of him.

To read the Scriptures and to pray in private is to tarry with him. To reflect upon the goodness of God, to meditate upon the teachings of Christ, to keep the silent hour and commune with the Father in the fellowship of prayer—this is tarrying with the Lord. After Jesus' baptism in the river Jordan, in which he received the approval of the Father, he withdrew for forty days of meditation in the wilderness. After Saul's conversion on the Damascus way, a period elapsed when he disappeared from public life. He seems to have spent three years in Arabia meditating, reflecting, tarrying with his Lord. The potency of private devotions, even for brief periods, is exceeding great. A few moments alone in one's room, a quiet walk along an unfrequented road or through a wooded pasture—these may become to the spiritually minded an oratory of the soul.

Faithful attendance at church service is a process of tarrying full of possibilities. The hymns of faith, the public prayer, the reading of the Holy Scriptures, the communion of the Lord's Supper, these are all designed to conduct the worshiper to the very heart of God. To enter into such a service with mind and heart in accord is to tarry with the Lord. On the birthday of the church, that memorable Pentecost in Jerusalem, three thousand came to Christ as Lord and Saviour, and then, having come, they tarried. The forty-second verse of the second chapter of Acts reads, "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and the prayers." "They continued," that is, they tarried; and this is important; for while they tarried they were learning and while they were learning they were in course of training for active Christian ministrations. The church, "the called together," closely resembles a school. The teaching function blends with the devotional in the ideal service of the house of God. Through tarrying with the Lord comes power: power with God and man. Some there are who, having come to Christ in the initial act of baptism, go no further; they do not care to tarry, they do not regard it as necessary; or if they tarry, it is but for a brief season, and then they disappear from the services in the house of God.

Every age has had great need to tarry with the Lord, particularly our own age. We are not given to reflection, and we like much the clamor and confusion of the crowd. We may not exactly despise the cloister, but we certainly depreciate it. Oliver Wendell Holmes has left this significant statement: "I have a tender plant growing in the corner of my heart that needs to be watered at least once a week, and that tender plant is called 'reverence.' I find nourishment for it in attendance on worship in the house of God."

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." That is the first invitation of Jesus. The second is, "Tarry ye until ye be clothed with power from on high."

"GO." To come to Jesus is not enough. To tarry with him is not all. Having called his disciples to him, they companied with him for a season; then Jesus sent them out. The Twelve were disciples or learners before they were apostles or missionaries. They were called to him that they might be trained of him in order to be sent out by him. He sent out the Twelve to teach the Kingdom of God and to heal the sick. They went out two and two, teaching what they had learned of him, blessing and doing good to all who would receive them. Jesus sent out the Seventy; he sent them out, two and two before his face, into every city and place whither he himself was about to come. The calling of his disciples and their tarrying with him was but preparatory for actual service in his name. The parting command of Jesus to his disciples and to all who become his disciples is, "Go, make disciples of all nations, preach the Gospel to every creature."

It is an historic fact that the early church was slow to heed this command, "Go." The mother church in Jerusalem was perfectly content to tarry, and to tarry all the while. Its members had heeded the first great command, "Come." They had obeyed the second, "Tarry." But not the third, "Go." That large body which composed the mother church were enraptured with worship and praise and fellowship one with another. For the larger part they were kind and benevolent, but they were not missionaries. They were singularly unmindful of the great world beyond Jerusalem into which they were commanded to go. So it came about that persecution of the Jerusalem church arose, and its members were scattered to the four winds. That persecution was a blessing in disguise, for the members of the Jerusalem church were scattered and went everywhere preaching the Word.

Many of our modern churches resemble the mother church in that we are loath to heed the command to "Go." It is easy to make ourselves believe that church attendance is an end in itself. It is pleasant to think of church service as expressly given to contribute to our comfort and entertainment. Beautiful singing, eloquent preaching, impressive rituals, and spacious edifices have their uses; but when these are conceived as a goal in themselves, church attendance may become the quintessence of selfishness. Christians are called together in the church service in order that they may make disciples of the community, the state, the nation, the world. Followers of the Christ are to assemble each Lord's day morning, that they may know the will of God as manifested in his Son. The service is to put them in remembrance of him, and the communion of the Lord's Supper is in particular so designed. Thus meditating on him, they are made ashamed of their foolish pride and haughty spirit; there they are to empty themselves of worldliness, love of power, place, and fill themselves with the Spirit and the very mind of Christ. Thence from the house of God the worshipers are to go home, seeking to build their households after Christian ideals; to return to the realm of business, and there set up the standards of the Christ; others to the realm of official life, and there express in law and spirit the ideals and principles of the Christ.

A church service that results only in pleasing the attendants, making them feel comfortable and satisfied, is a tragic failure and a travesty on the purpose of the church in the mind of its Founder. If one can sit week after week, and listen to high ideals that he has not yet attained to, and which he never attempts to reach, then his sin of inactivity is greater than if he did not hear or listen at all to such admonitions.

In his profitable little volume entitled, "Prayer Changes Things," Mr. S. D. Gordon imagines a conversation between Christ and the angel Gabriel, soon after the Ascension. Gabriel is asking Jesus what plans he had made to let all the world know how he lived and died and rose again. And the Master is supposed to reply: "I asked Peter and James and John, and some more of them down there, just to go and make it the business of their lives to tell the others. And the others are to tell others, and the others yet others, and still others beyond, till the last man in the farthest reach has heard the story, and has been caught, thrilled and thralled by the power of it." But Gabriel looks as if he could see difficulty in the Master's plan, and he says, "Yes, Master, suppose after a while Peter forgets. Suppose John loses his enthusiasm and simply doesn't tell the others. Suppose their successors away down there in the twentieth century get so busy about things, some of them good things—church things maybe—suppose they get so busy that they do not tell the others. What then?" And back came that quiet voice of the Lord Jesus. He says, "Gabriel, I haven't made any other plans. I am counting on them."

"Come!" "Tarry!" "Go!" These are the three great verbs of the Gospel. They are in the imperative mood. They are commands. They are to be obeyed by loyal disciples everywhere. Come to Christ. Tarry to learn of him. Then Go tell others of the Saviour of the world.

The Soul's True Home

SUNDAY, October 21. Phil. 1 : 8. "God is my witness, how greatly I long after you all in the heart of Jesus Christ." The apostle lived in the heart of Jesus Christ, and from that wonderful home of the Lord's love he longed for the salvation of others. From the heart of Christ he sought the hearts of others. He first of all sat down at the table of his Saviour's love, and feasting on the incomparable bounties of grace he longed that all men should be his fellow guests and share the wonderful privileges of the feast. Yes, it was a guest calling for other guests, and it was a call from the very heart of the Lord. Everything the apostle said and did carried the fragrance of his eternal home. Everything was a homecall from the heart of Jesus Christ.

If we alter the apostle's words, inserting words which give him another center and another standing, we shall see how deadly is the impoverishment. Let us make this alteration: "God is my witness, how greatly I long after you all in the example of Jesus Christ." We have made another world. In the first place I do not think that an example would ever have created such an impetuous current of influence as would have filled the apostle with ardent longing, and driven him in sacrificial ministry to the ends of the world. He had not been saved by an example. He had been saved by something which could never be imitated, even by the atoning death of the Son of God. And an example is not the fundamental need of any of us. What is the good of bringing in a ruddy athlete to one whose bones are broken and who is lying in physical ruin? What use is it to bring in a Paderewski to one whose hands are withered? What do we accomplish by bringing a sweet little child into the presence of a leper? No, it is not a fine example we need, but a Saviour's heart, a Saviour who will give his life for us that we may share the power of his resurrection. Paul longed after others in the heart of Jesus. The Master's Unfinished Work

MONDAY, October 22. Acts 1 : 1. "All that Jesus began to do and teach." The logical inference of these words is that Jesus left some things unfinished. If so, what did he mean when he himself cried out, "It is finished"? His suffering was about to end. The Atonement was about complete. All Jesus could do was nearly done. Then what does Luke mean by the things Jesus only "began to teach and do"? Just this: that in the conquest of evil and in the building of the kingdom of God on earth, the utmost that Jesus could do was to live the perfect life, speak the germinal truth, scatter the good seed, and leave to successive generations of his disciples the fulfilment of the plan.

We are not to forget, Jesus left us a program. We find it in the three chapters of Matthew which contain the Sermon on the Mount. The briefest summary of the program is this: The establishment of the reign of the law of love in human hearts. This is for us to teach and to do. Furthermore, Jesus gave each of his disciples a message to convey, to repeat and pass on from lip to lip. The message is simple, yet so significant as to be quite sufficient to transform the world from gloom to glory, from despair to hope, from hatred to good will. Because of this program and this message, Jesus gave us a life to develop. Rather, let us call it "the life." Early Christians spoke of Christianity as "the way," as though it were the only way. It is the only way to peace and hope and moral power. Paul speaks of it as "the life that really is," as though no other life were worthy of comparison with it. No other life is.

How does life develop? Only by self-expression. The musician develops his power by musical expression, the artist by artistic expression. The Christian develops his divine gift of life by Christian expression. In other words, Christ speaks to the world through our lives. What does he say? What are we saying for him? If we lack anything of love or labor or self-denial, we are repressing the divine life that seeks expression in us and through us. C. C. A.

The Foundation

TUESDAY, October 23. Ps. 11 : 1–3. "In the Lord put I my trust: how say ye to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain? For, lo, the wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string, that they may privily shoot at the upright in heart. If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?" David was oppressed by mighty, crafty, and powerful enemies when he wrote these words. They had undermined the pillars of his strength in the state, and since David was the chosen of God and lived according to the ordinances of God, they would have destroyed also the foundations of David's faith in God. Timid, unsafe, and false friends counseled flight, but David turns his eyes to the mighty Lord in his holy temple, the Lord whose throne is in the heavens, and whose eyelids try the children of men. He trusts in the word and assistance of God. He does not flee from God but to God. He refuses the advice of weak and cowardly men.

It is well known to students of history how Luther comforted himself with this Psalm in days when his life was not worth a farthing and the same advice was urged upon him that David received. The foundations on which men's faith is to rest had been well nigh destroyed in his day; the word of God counted little with his opponents; the Saviour's merits were withheld from the people, and Christ's rule in the church was broken. His trust in God alone was what upheld Luther in his conflicts. It has been well remarked that "the confidence and comfort which the saints have in God, when all the hopes and joys in the creatures fail them, is a riddle to a carnal world, and is ridiculed accordingly. Good people would be undone if they had not a God to go to, and a future bliss to hope for." In times of danger Christians must dread nothing as much as the frown of God, and desire his favor better than life. W. H. T. D.

The Lost Child

WEDNESDAY, October 24. Luke 2 : 45. "And when they found not the child Jesus, they turned back again to Jerusalem, seeking him." As Mary found her boy in the temple, joy filled her heart; but what greater delight she must have had when she heard the words, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

A lost child touches the heart of humanity about as deeply as the heart of the home. The loss of a child often becomes the source of greater grief than death itself, because of the awfulness of the suspense. A mother recently wrote to one of the war generals in Europe saying, "If I could only know whether my boy is dead or alive, or where he is buried, so I could visit his grave and weep there, I would be content. This oppressive suspense is killing me." A million mothers and loved ones are in the same condition of terrible anxiety all over Europe.

One evening, when Rev. Dr. Eddy, then editor of the Chicago Christian Advocate, was returning home from his day's toil, his eldest son met him, saying, "Little Ramie is lost." For eighteen hours the family, the friends and the police were searching for his three-year-old boy. Dr. Eddy said he never knew the meaning before of the word "suspense." In the morning, as he went to the breakfast table, seeing the little fellow's high chair at the table, the rocking horse and the little cap near by, he totally collapsed. He felt he could hardly endure the awful agony longer. The morning paper brought the news of a child found by a German, and, hearing that the man was now coming toward his home, Dr. Eddy gazed down the street. How far one can see who is looking for his lost child! Yes, it was our child! What joy filled that home over the rescued one, more than over the three other children who had not gone astray! E. W. A Blind Man's Faith

THURSDAY, October 25. Mark 10 : 47, 48. "And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, . . . and many charged him that he should hold his peace: but he cried the more a great deal, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me." When the blind beggar of Jericho heard that Jesus was coming, he posted himself by the roadside where the Master was sure to pass. Just as the Great Physician was passing, the blind man cried out, to attract attention and to obtain help. There were those who bade the blind man be silent. They disliked his vociferous cry. They were "proper" people, who objected to excitement, and they would have remanded Bartimeus to the back streets and to silence. They were discouragers—and the race is not yet extinct. But the blind man was not easily discouraged. His blindness had taught him patience, his deep need gave him boldness, and something told him this might be his last chance. It was his last chance—Jesus never passed that way again.

The blind beggar had both patience and boldness because he had faith. Founded in part upon hearsay, and in part, no one knows how largely, upon intuition, his faith led him to cry out all the more. Bartimeus is a pattern to us. We too are in the dark. Our eyes have never seen the form and face of Jesus. Our hands have never touched his seamless robe. But we may apprehend him with faculties of the soul; we may lay hold on him as really as though he were visible and tangible. When we do thus apprehend the presence and person of the Saviour, we too receive our sight. Indeed, we never see things as they are until we see them through eyes the Great Physician has anointed.

> "Blind and alone in the darkness,
> Feeble, uncertain I stray;
> Come to me, Master and Saviour,
> Say to me, 'I am the Way.'"

Grounds of Belief

FRIDAY, October 26. I Cor. 1 : 9. "God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord." The purpose of this apostolic reminder is to establish Christians in the firm belief that they will attain to the end of their faith, the salvation of their souls.

Two powerful reasons are adduced for this purpose:

1. The fidelity of God. God is not a fickle being whose affections easily change from love to aversion. He is constant in love; his mercies upon his children are renewed every morning. He is true to his promise: As thy days so shall thy strength be. His children shall at no time lack means to cope with the dangers that beset them on their journey heavenward. He knows their frailty and their weaknesses; he has foreseen all their temptations, and he has made ample provision by his grace for every emergency.

2. God committed himself to the cause of his followers, when he gave them the first fruits of the Spirit, the beginnings of their faith. It was by his grace that they were called unto the fellowship of his Son. He made them his children and Christ's brothers by his regenerating grace. They were led to know and embrace Jesus as their Lord. Divine grace continued to flow out to them from God and enriched them in all utterance and all knowledge. They were made wise unto salvation, able witnesses for Christ, and thoroughly furnished unto every good work. No gift which they need for a true Christian life has been denied them; they are ready to join the Lord in his heavenly glory, and only wait for his coming. The time intervening between their present and their future state, with all the trials that it may bring, is also in God's hand. His confirming grace will surround them as with an impregnable wall. No power shall snatch them out of God's hands. The call which they received and accepted points to the goal in heaven; in fact, it was issued to the very end that they might reach that goal. It may therefore serve as an assurance to Christians that he who hath begun a good work in them will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ. These two grounds of the Christian's assurance are firm and immovable; every other ground is unreliable. W. H. T. D.

Humility

SATURDAY, October 27. Mark 16 : 9. "Now when Jesus was risen, early the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene." Mary Magdalene is celebrated in art next to the mother of Jesus. There was such beautiful expression and loveliness in her countenance that the eyes of the world have delighted to gaze on her face. Titian and Murillo painted her as turning away from the world of sin that she might look heavenward, where her Christ had gone, showing in her face her intense longing to follow him. Guido Reni portrays Mary as looking downward, contemplating the cross which she is holding in her hand. This is an exquisite representation of her devotion, all-absorbing love and absolute self-surrender to him who is the Christ crucified. Rosetti has given the world a striking portrait of Mary at the door of Simon. He has written a poem descriptive of the fine ideal of his painting.

> "Oh, loose me! Seest thou not my Bridegroom's face
> That draws me to him? For his feet my kiss,
> My hair, my tears he craves to-day: and oh,
> What words can tell what other day and place
> Shall see me clasp those blood-stained feet of his?
> He needs me, calls me, loves me: let me go!"

Rubens's "Christ in the House of Simon" represents cultured guests from the town who, with Simon, are revolting against Jesus allowing a harlot to wash his feet. Three of the disciples, also among the invited, are almost equally surprised until Jesus begins to reprove Simon, whose heart seems like steel in its pride and self-righteousness.

Is not this a scene true to life in our day, where the rich and great, wrapped in their garments of social distinction, racial caste and churchly form, draw away from him who preached that "though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow." E. W. C.

Congress Asks a Day of Prayer

IT will be very welcome intelligence to many readers of the Christian Herald, and indeed to Christians everywhere, to learn that the United States Senate has taken the initiative in passing, by a unanimous vote, a resolution calling upon the President to appoint a National Day of Prayer. Senator Henry L. Myers of Montana introduced the resolution. The preamble recites the fact of our country being engaged in the greatest war of history, and that it will soon be sending great numbers of our young men to the front; also that it is in accordance "with the customs and traditions of this country as a Christian nation, and has heretofore been the practice of this country upon engaging in war, to set aside a day by official proclamation for prayer for the aid of the Almighty." Then follows the resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is, requested by Congress to issue a proclamation, designating a day of prayer and calling upon the people of this country on such a day to assemble in their various places of worship, and there offer prayer to Almighty God for the success of our armies and victory for our cause in this great conflict."

In the House of Representatives the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which gave a hearing on the subject. There was some opposition to the phrase "a Christian nation," but Rev. Dr. Martin, who appeared before the committee, defended the language of the resolution, pointing to the fact that the use of the oath, with its solemn appeal to God, in our courts, the employment of chaplains in our army and navy and our public institutions; the Christian laws upon our statute books; the acknowledgment of God in almost all of our state constitutions; the recognition of the Deity in our annual Thanksgiving proclamations, and finally, the decision of numerous civil courts that Christianity "is a part of the common law of the land"—all these combine to substantiate the truthfulness of the statement in the preamble, that we are "a Christian nation."

He contended, however, that the resolution should have gone still farther, and that the request should have been for the designation of "a day of prayer, of humiliation before God and confession of sin." Such an amendment would represent the true attitude of this nation, and would be especially appropriate in the great crisis through which we are passing. We need divine forgiveness as well as guidance, and we shall receive both if we only ask in sincerity.

Taxing Periodicals to Death

THE new tax on periodicals, in the form of enormously increased postage rates, has little to be said in its favor and much to be said against it.

The complexities of the rates on advertising and on zone distances render the tax bunglesome, variable and uncertain; but in its application to the Christian Herald it is estimated that the increase will be from 1 cent a pound to 3¼ cents a pound, or from $40,000 a year to $130,000 a year.

The general shipping interests have shown that they could not stand an increase of even 15 per cent. in transportation rates; but upon the periodicals has been put an increase of more than 200 per cent. in transportation rates.

It is discriminatory, even among publications. The rate is virtually left on most newspapers as it was, while multiplied by more than three on nationally circulated periodicals. Twenty-three per cent. of all publications are expected to pay 98 per cent. of the total tax.

It is confiscatory. Eighty-six representative periodicals of general circulation paid last year $1,243,465.99 in postage, while their total net profits for the year were $1,197,403.73. The amount of postage under the new measure will be about $5,000,000. Could they survive on this basis it would be at a total loss of $2,518,506.33 a year.

The periodical publishers have been willing and anxious to pay any excess profits taxes, any income taxes, any taxes whatever that might be levied equitably. The Christian Herald and scores of others have offered to give all their profits to the government for the duration of the war. But is it just that one class of publishers be taxed far more than all their profits, and the larger and more prosperous class of publishers left practically untouched?

This high tax defeats its purpose by destroying its own source of revenue. Only the periodicals carrying heavy advertising or charging a high subscription price can survive. Papers of highest moral appeal are hardest hit.

There is a still higher consideration, a broader significance and a farther-reaching evil resulting from this burden upon the periodicals. The periodicals of national circulation are the great mediums for the exchange of public opinion on this great continent, for the creation of a national spirit, for the welding together of the thought and feeling of a widely diversified population scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Only by the instrumentality of such publications is the creation and the crystallization of a national sentiment, a Christian ideal and a moral aspiration possible.

The national periodicals have obliterated sectional differences of opinion and purpose. In the pages of the periodicals the peoples of the East and the West, the North and the South, find a complete exposition of the issues, of the events, of the vast and multiform life of the country as a whole.

Now is to be crippled or destroyed this agency, this homogeneity, by making it impossible, through prohibitive zone rates, for the Eastern periodical to reach the West and for the Western periodical to reach the East.

We face the establishment of three distinct zones of publication, three distinct zones of thought and feeling, ideals and purposes.

We face the destruction of that great force which the periodicals have been creating—the force of a united public opinion and crystallized national and moral sentiment.

Back to the Farms

FOR years the tendency of ambitious young men has been from the farms to the cities, lured by the bigger wages and greater opportunities. The steady migration has resulted in a decided effect upon both city wages and the value of farm products. Laws above human control are bound to turn the tide of migration back from the cities to the farms. The country is full of enthusiastic panegyrists of the bucolic life who are urging us all to rush back to the farms.

But nobody is yearning particularly toward the cleaning of stables and the milking of six cows by lantern-light after a long day spent jumping about behind a harrow. There is everything in agriculture to attract a man who has somebody to do the work for him, and very little to attract the youth who has to do the work for somebody else. Of all the panegyrists of farming how many of them, if they were born on a farm, stuck to it? Certainly not the greatest of them all, Quintus Horatius Flaccus. Horace was born on a farm, to be sure, and in after years went back to another farm; but he quitted the first at an early age and went to the other only under circumstances which rendered any familiarity with milking-stools and pitchforks unnecessary.

There are beautiful things said in high praise of farming, but they are said by men who have others to do their farming for them. The real farmers are not much on panegyrics.

We are all agreed that there must be a move back to the farm, but every last one of us is waiting for the other fellow to make the move. In strange contradiction to ordinary human nature, we all are urging upon the other fellow a good thing.

Whose Prosperity?

THE present prosperity of the American people, say the careful statisticians, has never been equaled in any country in the history of the world.

Even as strong language as this does not sufficiently convey to the mind a full realization of the truth. Our industrial prosperity is measured in figures so vast as to make even a man with empty pockets hurrah for this glorious period.

But of special significance to the thoughtful are the figures showing the concentration of manufactures in large establishments, which has become one of the conspicuous developments of our economic life.

Corporations owning less than 25 per cent. of the manufacturing establishments of the country produce more than 75 per cent. of the total value of all goods manufactured. More than 37 per cent. of all capital employed in manufacturing is invested in establishments having a capital of $1,000,000 or over, and more than 81 per cent. in establishments having capital in excess of $100,000.

It is fine to see the big figures of prosperity. But it is no narrow pessimism which looks beyond them and feels concerned that great aggregations of capital should take so large a share of the prosperity to themselves.

If our marvelous industrial progress is not enriching the millions, it is at least making innumerable millionaires.

Possibly prosperity for the great trusts is better than no prosperity at all—possibly not.

But the ideal prosperity, which this country of boundless natural resources ought to have, not only for short periods but for all time, is that which would bring better conditions of labor and life to the masses.

John Goode and His Message

LOOKING over the results of the first season of the evangelistic ministry of John Goode, we find abundant cause for gratification. He has delivered his message to audiences in over half a dozen states, and it is not only one that carries a tremendous appeal to the sinner, but it is a powerful inspiration to God's people wherever it is spoken. We question whether since the days of Jerry McAuley any one has appeared who can so surely reach down and touch the hearts of hardened sinners as this man does, speaking from the personal experience of one who has been literally "saved from the depths."

We might wellnigh fill a page of the Chtistian Herald with the ardent testimonials of ministers of all denominations in whose churches John Goode has delivered his wonderful message. "If the Bowery Mission had produced but one conversion, such as John Goode," writes a Flushing, N. Y., pastor, "its thirty-seven years of redeeming history would be worth while. Every church in the land should hear his story." A Philadelphia minister declares: "Our short acquaintance with Mr. Goode will grow into a lifetime friendship." Another in Allentown, Pa.: "We were delighted with his gentle spirit and sincerity. We must have a bigger heart now, because we must place him in it, with others whom we have learned to know and love." Pastor Sheldon of Topeka, Kan., the famous author of "In His Steps," writes us that he regards John Goode's story as "intended to teach a great lesson, and it will accomplish that purpose." A pastor in Mount Vernon, N. Y., after hearing his message, wrote: "I hope he can circulate generally, in order that he may give to as many as possible the benefit of his experience and his wonderful conquest."

We might go on indefinitely, but these are enough to show the character of John Goode's reception in the churches and the impression made by his visit. Those who know him best, and who have noted the manifestations of divine grace in the transformation of his character, are strongly hoping that he may be led to speak in many churches in the Eastern and Middle states the coming winter. Ministers who desire to have him speak in their churches during November or December can address him in care of the Christian Herald.

The American Voice

OUR soldiers over the sea attract attention and excite no little amusement, it is said, because of the peculiarities of the American voice and speech.

It emphasizes anew the old fact that the speech of the average American, and particularly his vocalization, is a composite result of influences from many sources.

It used to be said that the German talks from his diaphragm, the Englishman from his throat, the Frenchman from his palate, and the American from his nose.

But it must not be forgotten that the American voice, like the American character, is in a process of evolution, combining together all that is best in other peoples.

An American child is apt to have a German mother, a French father, an Englishman as a teacher and an Italian girl as a sweetheart and wife. So there can be no physical qualities, either faults or virtues, that can apply to us as a whole people.

But it is admittedly true that the most mellifluous vocalization heard anywhere in the whole world prevails all through our South. It is asserted by the most learned linguists that the purest English spoken anywhere today is spoken in that same section and in Dublin, Ireland.

There is this fact, however, which may or may not be peculiar: the American speaks to make himself understood, and generally succeeds, wherever he may be.

OUR GREATEST TAX BILL. The War Revenue Bill expected to raise $2,535,000,000 was finally passed by the House October 1, and by the Senate October 2. It provides for a normal tax of 2 per cent. on all incomes, and one per cent. additional on all incomes over $5,000 increasing through sixteen gradations to 50 per cent. on all over $1,000,000. The exemption limits are placed at $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married.

Four per cent. is levied on the incomes of corporations, joint stock companies and insurance companies, and an additional tax of 20 to 60 per cent. is levied on incomes which equal 15 to 33 per cent. of the capital invested.

A tax is provided on alcoholic beverages of $2.10 per gallon and on perfumes of $1.10. A special tax of 8 per cent. is levied on incomes in excess of $6.000, of salaried or professional persons.

The rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class except post cards shall be, in addition to the existing rate, 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof. Letters from soldiers are free of postage.

The following is a condensation of the sections referring to the second class:

That on and after July 1, 1918, the rates of postage on second-class matter, (A) in the case of the portion of such publication devoted to matter other than advertisements, shall be as follows: (1) On and after July 1, 1918, and until July 1, 1919, 1¼ cents per pound or fraction thereof; (2) On and after July 1, 1919, 1½ cents per pound or fraction thereof. (B) In the case of the portion of the publication devoted to advertisements the rates per pound or fraction thereof for delivery within the several zones applicable to fourth class matter shall be as follows (but where the space devoted to advertisements does not exceed 5 per cent. of the total space, the rate of postage shall be the same as if the whole of such publication was devoted to matter other than advertisements): 1918 to 1919, first to eighth zones, 1¼ to 3½ cents; 1919 to 1920, 1½ to 5½ cents; 1920 to 1922, 1¾ to 7¾ cents; 1922 and after, 2 to 10 cents.

Newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interest of religious, educational, scientific, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations or associations, not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, will pay regardless of advertising carried, 1¼ cents a pound or fraction thereof, on and after July 1, 1918, and until July 1, 1919, and on and after July 1,1919, 1½ cents a pound or fraction thereof.

It is expected that these rates will be revised at the next session of Congress.

BLOCKADING EUROPE. Following the lead of the United States, Great Britain on October 2 declared an absolute embargo against the exportation of any articles, except printed matter and personal effects accompanied by their owners, to Sweden, Norway, Denmark and the Netherlands. It was expected that the other Allied nations would take similar action.

BACKING UP THE SOLDIERS. The Senate on October 3 passed the War Deficiency Appropriation Bill authorizing more than $7,000,000,000 of expenditures, all of which will find its way into some element of the struggle against Germany. The House passed the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Rights Bill, and the Senate passed the measure providing insurance for the soldiers and for the care of their dependents, but it was expected that the Civil Rights Bill could not be passed by the Senate until the next session in December. Both Houses of Congress made determined efforts to adjourn by October 6.

MAY ASK INDEMNITY. Count Czernin, Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, on October 3 in an address declared that unless peace without annexation and indemnity were immediately accepted it would be necessary for Austria-Hungary to revise its program and seek compensation for the further costs of the war. He advocated international agreements for complete disarmament and the maintenance only of such forces as were necessary to keep peace within the borders of each country, but suggested the process of disarmament would require perhaps more than a generation.

THE SECOND LIBERTY LOAN. With the ringing of bells and the blowing of whistles, and in hundreds of meetings of loyal citizens, the Second Liberty Loan, offering $3,000,000,000 worth of 4 per cent. bonds, was officially placed on the market on October 1. In all of the Eastern cities the night of September 30 was given to the hanging of posters and to the distribution of circulars, in order that every citizen on October 1 might face the opportunity to serve by saving, to "Serve and Save" being the accepted slogan for the campaign which is to close October 27.

MECHANICAL VICTORY. An Armenian mechanic, Garabed T. K. Giragossian, after twenty-six years of experimenting, has produced what he calls a "free energy generator." The device was approved by the House Committee on Patents, and on October 3 a special bill was put through the House by a vote of 234 to 14, under which the United States will have exclusive right to the invention. It is said the device will revolutionize all power problems and possibly win the war in short order, and that by its use a battleship may be driven any distance without a stop for fuel, while an airplane might be propelled around the world and could be given power enough to carry hundreds of pounds of ammunition, and that the speed of torpedoes and steam engines will be doubled. All details of the new invention are carefully guarded pending further demonstrations before expert engineers.

NATION-WIDE FOOD COOPERATION. Herbert Hoover, Federal Food Administrator, has issued a special appeal to the country to set aside the week of October 21 to October 28 for a nation-wide campaign to complete the enrolment of our citizens for the conservation of our food supply. Calling attention to the fact that with the harvest at hand it was now possible to measure the world's food resources, it was stated that available supplies were less this harvest year than last year, and that we exported last year more than we really could afford. We can only meet the call upon us next year by savings and by substitution of commodities which can not be transported. The Allies are our first line of defense. They must be fed, and food will win the war. All Europe is on rations or restricted supplies. The world depends upon us to guard and provide its food supply. This is a duty of necessity, humanity and honor. As a free people we have elected to discharge this duty, not under autocratic decree, but without other restraint than the guidance of individual conscience. On the success

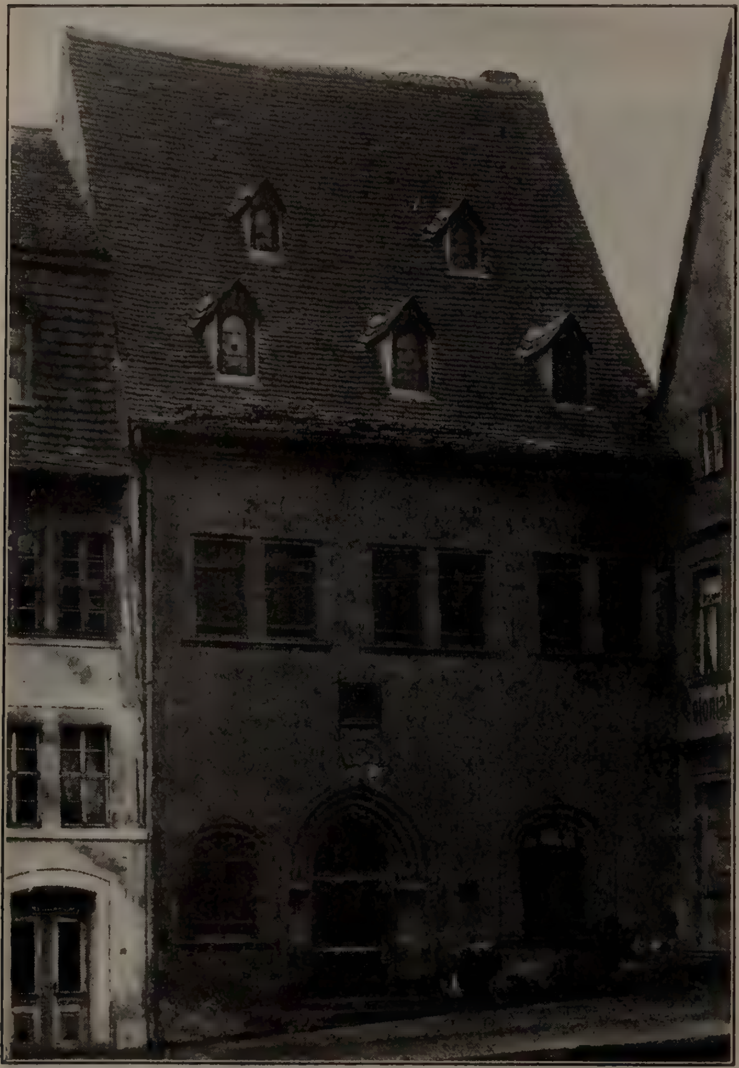
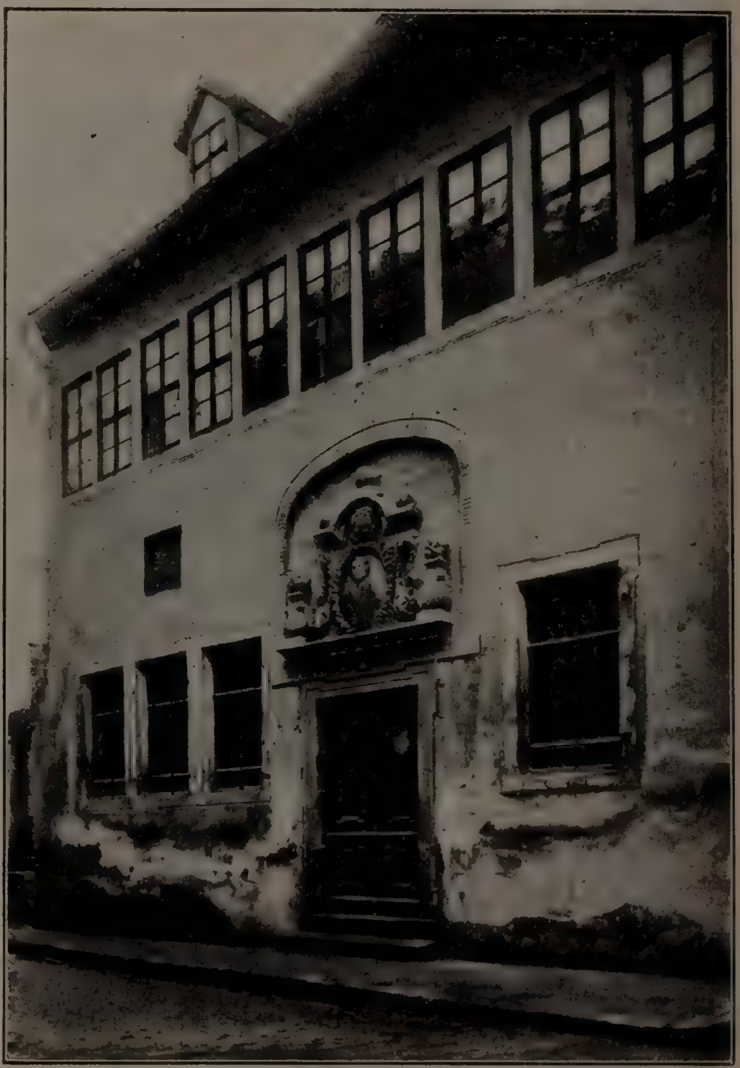
The Nation-wide Luther Celebration

By O. H. PANNKOKE, Executive Secretary of the New York Quadricentenary Committee



THE house of flesh in which the soul of man lives perishes when the soul moves out, but the house of stone used by the house of flesh persists, and if the soul has been great enough, mankind holds that house of stone as a memorial to keep alive remembrance of the deeds or thoughts or ideals of the soul. Thus we have the Shakespeare house at Stratford-on-Avon, Mount Vernon, the Lincoln Cabin, the Rectory at Epworth, and these two houses. The one at the left is the house from which the soul of Luther took flight; the one at the right, the house in which was born the babe who should waken Christendom to a new devotion to the truth.



IN a few weeks the four hundredth Reformation Anniversary will be a thing of the past—a memory to remain for a lifetime with the participants. It has succeeded in the things that are worth while. It has succeeded beyond the hopes and expectations even of those who were the prime movers in launching it and in planning to make it succeed.

A year and a half ago the first committees were formed, the first offices opened, the first secretaries appointed. The time was exceptional to commemorate the Reformation Quadricentennial. The world at war, and finally this nation breaking with the nation on whose soil and in whose bosom the great Reformation conflict raged. The anniversary bore the stamp of soberness and consecration. Its expression was serious and staid, not exuberant and volatile.

It is difficult to say whether a world at peace would have enlarged the participation in the anniversary. Surveying the groups that took part, it hardly seems so. It seems fair to say that the monk who shook the world in the sixteenth century brought his message to every Protestant in the United States at least once in the past year. In many places his work and teaching formed the central theme at dozens of successive gatherings. Not a Protestant body in America failed officially or unofficially to do its bit in honor of the hero of the Reformation, Martin Luther, and to commemorate the birth hour of Protestantism, the posting of the theses on October 31, 1517.

Most of the larger bodies had special committees to rouse the interest of their pastors and churches and to assist in arranging programs. In others the work was delegated to the various boards. It has been stated repeatedly that the Episcopal Church did not take part; yet, as a matter of fact, some of the most active participants were Episcopalian churches and associations, though officially it is true that the Episcopal Church took no action on the Quadricentennial.

In addition to the large denominations, interdenominational associations gave appropriate recognition to the event. The great Sunday School Associations aided with appropriate programs and helps. Missionary associations made the Reformation the theme for discussion and study. The Bible Societies recalled that out of the Reformation resulted the open Bible, and lent their influence to carry on the anniversary interest. Very early in the preparation the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America threw its weight in the balance, and sent an appeal throughout the land to make the Quadricentennial the outstanding fact of 1917. Its committee has since labored faithfully to follow up the initial impulse.

In fact, though the Reformation was distinctly the birth of Protestantism, its anniversary enlisted interest far beyond the Protestant pale. The National Education Association gave a place to its discussion; colleges and universities arranged for lectures and meetings and disseminated literature; public men and writers vied with churchmen to give expression to their appreciation of the results of the Reformation on every side of life.

From America the impulse has traveled to heathen lands. The Sunday school children of India, Egypt, Brazil, China and the Philippines are singing this year: "A Mighty Fortress is our God," and are learning the story of the intrepid monk who feared his God more than emperors and princes, who loved God's truth and Gospel message beyond the safety and comfort of life.

YES, there is no question, the Reformation Quadricentennial has been put across in a big way. When one reads again the half-hearted, doubtful, hesitant correspondence of the early months; when one recalls the questions of the early committee meetings and sees today a continent astir and moved in its soul, with impulses vibrating across the seas in heathen lands, that's the word: big! The Reformation anniversary is big in spite of war, in spite of sacrifice, in spite of pain and heartache that have blighted the joy of the world.

Nay, through the war the Reformation anniversary has really become big and vital in a measure which would have been impossible in times of peace. For the celebration not only has had extent; it had content. And the war has immeasurably deepened its content. If there had been no war, no doubt the tone and expression of the celebration would have emphasized the spectacular. In the early days many spectacular features were planned. New York dreamed of a large exhibition, open-air pageants, parades and similar demonstrations. When the war became more serious these plans were dropped. The celebration became more and more an occasion of consecration than an opportunity for thoughtless joy. Emphasis was laid on the spiritual and educational character of the anniversary with the view of enabling the people today to face their tasks the better through the encouragement and lessons of the past. The New York Committee has happily expressed this in one of its bulletins, which says: "To celebrate the Reformation Anniversary in times of peace is delightful. To recall it in the day of war and national need is inspiring in the measure that its message will hallow the people to do their duty by their country and its sacred ideals and responsibilities."

Then came the task of formulating plans, with detail sufficiently comprehensive and at the same time simple enough to be adaptable to the resources of the small as well as the large organizations. Great and complicated as was the undertaking it met with success. Much of the literature published for this purpose, pamphlets, suggestive folders, music booklets, is of course fugitive in character, intended to impress participants with the scope and importance of the anniversary and to arouse their interest and assign tasks. The New York Committee published a collection of appreciations by leading Americans, including such men as Bryan, Roosevelt, Owen, David Starr Jordan, Faunce and others, the title page being an exact reproduction of the title page of Luther's first Bible. Another of its pamphlets on Reformation music contained a beautiful picture of young Luther singing in Eisenach. The picture was brought from Germany by Dr. Coss of Columbia University in 1911 and was the only copy in America. The Joint Lutheran Committee featured the official medal and the slogan: "To celebrate the Reformation of the sixteenth century and to hasten the transformation of the twentieth." It is impossible to go into detail. Enough to say that never before was so much effort put to the task of making the literature and the programs of a religious celebration so striking in appearance, and so varied and impressive in content.

IN November, 1916, the New York World carried an announcement that the Reformation Anniversary would witness the greatest speaking campaign in the history of Protestantism in America. The event amply proved the truth of the prophecy. The keynote of the anniversary was education and inspiration, and naturally most of it was carried out through the spoken word. Churches, halls, Y. M. C. A.'s, schools and college auditoriums were the logical places to launch the speaking campaign, which covered every vital phase and incident of the Reformation. Thousands and tens of thousands of sermons and addresses were held. The New York Committee alone had a speaking staff during the year of over 200 men. Besides, nearly all the pastors in the New York district were persuaded to speak repeatedly on the Reformation in their churches. Proportionately as much was done in other centres. At the same time, the religious and secular publications granted their columns to a presentation of the Reformation Anniversary appeal. The various denominations enlisted the cooperation of their noted writers to help the cause. In addition the universities and public life furnished discussion from a wider viewpoint.

NOW we are approaching the end, the climax of a great year, the fruition of countless labors and cares. Will the anniversary year go out in a burst of glory, fittingly completing the work that preceded, leaving lingering regret that it was not longer? I have before me a series of reports from every part of this land, giving plans for the close of the anniversary. These reports show that every auditorium, coliseum, large meeting-place, from Canada to the Gulf, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, has been engaged for one or more mass meetings to close the anniversary. The most noted men in every walk of life have consented to speak. Tens of thousands of children and grown persons are organized into choirs to sing at these festivals. One city, Detroit, is planning to make the 31st of October a public holiday.

The example of New York, the metropolitan city of the land, is characteristic. The 1,500 Protestant churches in the district have been asked to commemorate Reformation Sunday with special services. The 470,000 Sunday school children will have their programs and exercises and organists and choir leaders are arranging to feature Reformation music. Afternoon and evening mass-meetings are scheduled in the Hippodrome, the Academy of Music, the Wartburg Auditorium, Carnegie Hall, the ninety Y. M. C. A.'s in New York City and vicinity, and in many schools.

The climax will come on Reformation Day, October 31, when the Lutheran Society, which backed the New York Committee, has arranged for a public demonstration at Carnegie Hall. Another notable event is a Reformation service planned for the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on Monday. All in all, there are scheduled more than fifty large mass meetings, extending over a period of two weeks, embracing every Protestant interest and activity, and fittingly bringing the anniversary to a climax.

What are the lasting results? In a cold monetary estimate, $50,000,000 have been added to Protestant activities, including education, missionary expansion, church extension, ministerial pensions, etc. According to the statement of Dr. Harris, the Methodist Church has used the Reformation appeal to raise a fund of $30,000,000. The Lutheran churches will raise $10,000,000 and the Reformed one million, while the Presbyterian churches are endowing chairs of Bible Teaching at their schools as a fitting memorial to the man who gave the world the open Bible.

But material things are not the essentials in life, especially not in church life. The Reformation itself gave no tangible possession to the nations. It gave ideals and principles and translated them into life. It did more for the world than the discovery of American silver and gold. Similarly, the Reformation Anniversary is not to be measured by a dollar-and-cent standard. It reaffirmed ideals, it restated with peculiar emphasis principles which the test of centuries of Christian and civic experience had proved vital. It stimulated in remarkable degree qualities of character basic to public and church life, the sense of duty, the love of truth above expediency, the courage of conviction and the willingness to sacrifice, which made the Reformation heroes fighters and conquerors.

DEFINITE reports are already at hand showing that these ideals are achieving practical results; that churches, local associations, whole denominations are going to their task with increased vision and heightened zeal. Many churches report growing enthusiasm and an increase in membership in church and Sunday school far beyond any previous experience. These are essential and vital results, and forces which will continue for many years. They furnish the real test whether the Reformation Anniversary was successful.

An influence and result not so general in extent, yet very vital to Protestantism and America, is the impulse which the anniversary gives to Christian education, the denominational college. A great deal of the anniversary fund is designated for this purpose. At the same time the anniversary has focused attention, in a commanding way, on this question and led to much fruitful discussion, which already has created for the denominational college a position of far greater usefulness and influence than before. In addition, the anniversary has aroused American church history students to lay the foundation for independent historical scholarship. At its 1916 convention, the American Society of Church History, including in its ranks the leading church-historians of this land, voted to raise an endowment fund of $100,000 to foster and expand historical investigations. One of the great reasons advanced was that while the history of America was made largely by Christian forces, no effort had yet been made to set forth what Protestantism had contributed to the growth of this nation.

The Reformation Anniversary might have been more striking in display, in appeal to the eye and the sense, if the times had been peaceful. It is doubtful, however, whether it could have been more intensive, vital and enduring in its results, reaching down to the things that are permanent in our national and religious life. Nor could it have reached out farther, for it reached all, and more could not be reached.

Paint Now—Delay means Decay

THIS is not a time to paint a white house yellow merely for the purpose of having a yellow house. But it is the time to paint if paint is needed to protect your home from the weather and keep it intact.

Look your home over and see if the weather is getting in. If so, decay is getting in and that means costly repairs. Paint to save, but be sure your paint is the kind that saves. You can be sure of the durability of

SHERWIN-WILLIAMS HOUSE PAINT

It is paint made specially for the exterior of buildings—made of materials which our 50 years of specializing have taught us will stand up against the weather for the longest time. When properly applied, Sherwin-Williams House Paint will give you a handsome protecting paint that will go for years without a sign of crack or blister.

Complete home protection requires other Sherwin-Williams products as well. There is a Sherwin-Williams dealer near you.

We study surfaces—the nature of each and the kind of wear each gets—then make the product that best protects it.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

STEPHEN MARSHALL, a college freshman, being hazed by the students, was carried to a theater where a very questionable play was on the stage. During the play an alarm of fire was given, and Stephen saved several lives before he fell a victim to the flames. Paul Courtland, a student, was in the theater and witnessed the heroic death of Stephen. He joined in the work of rescue, barely escaped with his life and lay for days in the hospital. When he could walk around he announced to his fellow students that he stood for Stephen Marshall's Christ. The students planned to neutralize this new spirit through the medium of Gila Dare, a worldly young lady, who was to invite Courtland to her house to tell him how she admired his heroic conduct at the fire. Abner Wittemore, who because of his slowness was called "Witless Abner," having received a telegram that his mother was dying, asked Courtland to carry a package of medicine to a poor old woman in whom he was interested. After praying with the old woman the first prayer of his life, Courtland started home, but had not gone far when he saw a boy run over by an automobile. He helped the child into the house, called a doctor, and when the child died made arrangements for a simple funeral, incidentally becoming acquainted with the child's sister, Bonnie Brentwood. The next day he engaged the Rev. John Burns to conduct the funeral, and then took the girl, who had collapsed from the strain, to a hospital. Then he wrote to Stephen Marshall's mother, whom he had never seen, asking her to take Bonnie Brentwood into her home, and offering to pay her handsomely for her trouble. Mother and Father Marshall were glad to welcome Bonnie as a daughter to take Stephen's place. Then Courtland asked Gila Dare to go to see Bonnie in the hospital.

CHAPTER XII

GILA DARE, in her very most startling costume, lavishly garnished with costly fur, came tripping down her father's steps to the limousine. She carried a dangling little trick of a hand-bag, and a muff big enough for a rug. Her two eyes looked forth from the rim of the low-squashed, bandage-like fur hat, like the eyes of a small, sly mouse that was about to nibble somebody else's cheese.

She gave an order for the hospital and set her face sternly to the duty before her.

A little breeze of expectation preceded her entrance into the hospital, a stir among the attendants about the door. Passing nurses apprized her furs and orchids; young internes took account of her eyes—the mouse-eyes had returned, but they lured with something unspeakable and thrilling in them.

She waited with a nice little superb air that made everybody hurry to serve her, and presently she was shown up to the door of Bonnie Brentwood's room. Her chauffeur had followed, bearing a large pastboard suit-box which he set down at the door and departed.

"Is this Miss Brentwood's room?" she asked of the nurse who opened the door grudgingly. Her patient had just awakened from a refreshing sleep and she had no notion that this lofty little person had really come to see the quiet, sad-eyed girl who had come there in such shabby little garments. The visitor had made a mistake, of course. The nurse grudgingly admitted that Miss Brentwood roomed there.

"Well, I've brought some things for her," said Gila, indicating the large box at her feet. "You can take it inside and open it."

The nurse opened the door a little wider, looked at the small, imperious personage in fur trappings, and then down at the box.

"You can set it inside if you wish, or wait till one of the men comes by," she said, coolly, and deliberately walked back in the room and busied herself with the medicine-glasses.

GILA stared at her haughtily a moment, but there wasn't much satisfaction in wasting her glares on that white-linen back, so she stooped and dragged in the box. She came and stood by the bed, staring down apprizingly at the sick girl.

Bonnie Brentwood turned her head wearily and looked up at her with a puzzled, half-annoyed expression.

"Is your name Brentwood?" asked Gila, in the sharp, high key so alien to a hospital.

Bonnie focused her gaze on the girl. Her abundant hair was spread out over the pillow. It fell in long, rich waves of brightness and fascinating little rings of gold about her face. Gila stared at it jealously, as if it were something that had been stolen from her. The face of the girl on the pillow was perfect in form and feature. Gila knew it would be counted rarely beautiful, and she was furious! How had that upstart of a college boy dared to send her here to see a beauty! What had he meant by it?

By this time the girl on the bed had summoned her soul back to earth. "Yes, I am Miss Brentwood."

There was no noticeable emphasis on the "Miss," but Gila felt that the pauper had arisen and put herself on the same level with her, and she was furious.

"Well, I've brought you a few things!" declared Gila, in a most offensive tone. "Paul Courtland asked me to come and see what I could do for you." She swung her moleskin trappings about and pointed to the box. "I don't believe in giving money," she declared, with a tilt of her little chin, "but I don't mind giving a little lift in other ways to persons who are truly worthy, you know. I've brought you a few evening dresses that I'm done with. It may help you to get a position playing for the movies, perhaps; or if you don't know rag-time, perhaps you might act—they'll take almost anybody, I understand, if they have good clothes. Besides, I'm going to give you an introduction to a girls' employment club. They have a hall and hold dances once a week and you get acquainted. It only costs you ten cents a week and it will give you a place to spend your evenings. If you join that, you'll need evening dresses for the dances. Of course, I understand some of the girls just go in their street suits, but you stand a great deal better chance of having a good time if you are dressed attractively. And then they say men often go in there evenings to look for a stenographer, or an actor, or some kind of a worker, and they always pick out the prettiest. Dress goes a great way if you use it rightly. Now there's a frock in here—" Gila stooped and untied the cord on the box. "This frock cost a hundred and fifty dollars, and I never wore it but once!"

SHE held up a tattered blue net adorned with straggling, crushed, artificial rosebuds, its sole pretention to a waist being a couple of straps of silver tissue attached to a couple of rags of blue net. It looked for all the world like a draggled butterfly.

"It's torn in one or two places," pursued Gila's ready tongue, "but it's easily mended. I wore it to a dance and somebody stepped on the hem. I suppose you are good at mending. A girl in your position ought to know how to sew. My maid usually mends things like this with a thread of itself. You can pull one out along the hem, I should think. Then here is a pink satin. It needs cleaning. They don't charge more than two or three dollars—or perhaps you might use gasoline. I had slippers to match, but I couldn't find but one. I brought that along. I thought you might do something with it. They were horribly expensive—made to order, you know. Then this cerise chiffon, all covered with sequins, is really too showy for a girl in your station, but in case you get a chance to act you might need it, and anyhow I never cared for it. It isn't becoming to me. Here's an indigo charmeuse with silver trimmings. I got horribly tired of it, but you will look stunning in it. It might even help you catch a rich husband, who knows! There's half a dozen pairs of white evening gloves! I might have had them cleaned, but if you can use them I can get new ones. And there's a bundle of old silk stockings! They haven't any toes or heels much, but I suppose you can darn them. And of course you can't afford to buy expensive silk stockings!"

One by one Gila had pulled the things out of the box, rattling on about them as if she were selling corn-cure. She was a trifle excited, to be sure, now that she was fairly launched on her philanthropic expedition; also the fact that the two women in the room were absolutely silent and gave no hint of how they were going to take this tide of insults was somewhat disconcerting. However, Gila was not easily disconcerted. She was very angry, and her anger had been growing in force all night. She did not care what she said, and she had no fear of any consequences whatever. There had not, so far to her knowledge, lived the man who could not be called back and humbled to her purpose after she had punished him sufficiently for any offense he might knowingly or unknowingly have committed. That she really had begun to admire Courtland, and to desire him in some degree for her own, only added fuel to her fire. This girl whom he had dared to pity should be insulted and extinguished utterly, so that she would never dare to lift her head again within recognizable distance of Paul Courtland. Paul Courtland was hers—if she chose to have him; let no other girl dare to look at him!

The nurse stood, starched and stern, with growing indignation at the audacity of the stranger. Only the petrification of absolute astonishment took her off her guard for the moment and prevented her from ejecting the young lady from the premises instantly.

Bonnie lay wide-eyed and amazed, startled bewilderment and growing dignity in her face. Two soft pink spots of color began to bloom out in her cheeks, and her eyes took on a twinkle of amusement. She lay and regarded her and her tawdry display of finery with a quiet, disinterested aloofness that was beginning to get on Gila's nerves.

"You can have my flowers, too, if you want them," said Gila, excitedly, seeing that her flood of insult had brought forth no answering word from either listener. "They're very handsome, rare ones—orchids, you know. Did you ever see any before? I don't mind leaving them with you because I have a great many flowers, and these were given me by a young man I don't care in the least about."

She unpinned the flowers and held them out to Bonnie, but the sick girl lay still and regarded her with that quiet, half-amused gravity and did not offer to take them.

"I presume you can find a waste-basket down in the office if you want to get rid of them," said Bonnie, suddenly, in a clear, refined voice. "I really shouldn't care for them. Isn't there a waste-basket somewhere about?" she asked, turning toward the nurse.

"Down in the hall by the front entrance," answered the nurse, grimly.

Gila stood haughtily looking from one woman to the other, unable to believe that any other woman had the insufferable audacity to meet her on her own ground in this way.

"I am sorry," said Bonnie quite politely, "but I'm afraid you have made some mistake. I don't recall ever having met you before. It must be some other Miss Brentwood for whom you are looking."

Gila stared, and her color suddenly began to rise even under the pearly tint of her flesh. Had she possibly made some blunder?

"Don't you know Paul Courtland?" she demanded, imperiously.

"I never heard the name before!" Bonnie's voice was steady, and her eyes looked coolly into the other girl's. The nurse looked at Bonnie and marveled. She knew the name of Paul Courtland well; she telephoned to that name every day. How was it that the girl did not know it? She liked this girl and the man who had brought her here and been so anxious about her. But who on earth was this huzzy in fur?

Gila looked at Bonnie haughtily and said scornfully, "Aren't you the poor girl whose kid brother got killed by an automobile in the street?"

Across Bonnie's stricken face there flashed a spasm of pain and her very lips grew white.

"I thought so!" sneered Gila, rushing on with her insult. "And yet you deny that you ever heard Paul Courtland's name! He picked up the kid and carried it in the house and ran errands for you, but you don't know him! That's gratitude for you! I told him the working-class were all like that. I have no doubt he has paid for this very room that you are lying in!"

"Stop!" cried Bonnie, sitting up, her eyes like two stars, her face white to the very lips. "You have no right to come here and talk like that! I cannot understand who could have sent you! Certainly not the courteous stranger who picked up my little brother. I do not know his name, nor anything about him, but I can assure you that I shall not allow him or any one else to pay my bills. Now will you take your things and leave my room? I am feeling very tired!"

The voice suddenly trailed off into silence and Bonnie dropped back limply upon the pillow.

THE nurse sprang like an angry bear who has seen somebody troubling her cubs. She touched vigorously a button in the wall as she passed and swooped down upon the tawdry finery, stuffing it unceremoniously into the box; then she turned upon the little fur-trimmed lady, placed a capable arm about her slim waist, and scooped her out of the room. Flinging the bulging box down at her feet, where it gaped widely, gushing forth in pink, blue, cerise, and silver, she shut the door and flew back to her charge.

Down the hall hurried the emergency doctor, formidable in his white linen uniform. When Gila looked up from the confusion at her feet she encountered the gaze of a pair of grave and disapproving eyes behind a pair of fascinating tortoise-shell goggles. She was not accustomed to disapproval in masculine eyes and it infuriated her.

"What does all this mean?" His voice expressed a good many kinds of disapproval.

"It means that I have been insulted, sir, by one of your nurses!" declared Gila, in her most haughty tone. "I shall make it my business to see that she is removed at once from her position."

The doctor eyed her mildly, as though she were a small bat squeaking at a mighty hawk. "Indeed! I fancy you will find that a rather difficult matter!" he answered, contemptuously. "She is one of our best nurses! James!" to a passing assistant, "escort this person and her—belongings"—looking doubtfully at the mess on the floor—"down to the street!"

Then he swiftly entered Bonnie's room, closing and fastening the door behind him.

The said James, with an ill-concealed grin, stooped to his task; and thus, in mortification, wrath, and ignominy did Gila descend to her waiting limousine.

There were tears of anger on her cheeks as she sat back against her cushions; more tears fell, which, regardless of her pearly complexion, she wiped away with a cobweb of a handkerchief. Defeat was a thing she could not brook. But it should not be defeat! She would take her full revenge for all that had happened! Courtland should bite the dust! Arrived at home, she stormed up to her room, giving orders to her maid not to disturb her, and sat down angrily to indite an epistle to Courtland that should bring him to his knees.

MEANTIME the doctor and nurse worked silently, skilfully over Bonnie until the weary eyes opened once more and a long-drawn sigh showed that the girl had come back to the world.

You cannot buy much meat for the price of Heinz Baked Beans, and that meat would not contain nearly so much nourishment. You must buy other things to go with meat, also at high prices, while Heinz Baked Beans are a complete food—a complete meal. They taste as good as meat because they are real baked beans—oven-baked. And meat must be cooked with extra fuel and labor—while Heinz Baked Beans require only heating and are delicious served cold.

The Witness

By and by, when the doctor had gone out of the room and the nurse had finished giving her the beef-tea that had been ordered, Bonnie raised her eyes. "Would you mind finding out for me just what this room costs?" she asked, wearily.

"Why, I'm under the impression you won't have to pay anything," the nurse said, pleasantly. "You see, sometimes patients, when they go out, are kind of grateful and leave a sort of endowment of a bed for a while, or something like that. I believe some one paid something for this room in some kind of a way like that. You needn't worry a bit about it."

Bonnie smiled. "Would you mind making sure?" she asked. "I'd like to know just what I owe. I have a little money, you know."

The nurse nodded and slipped away, returning promptly.

"You don't have to pay a cent," she said, cheerfully, as she returned. "This bed is endowed temporarily. The doctor wants to keep you here till some one comes who needs this room more than you do. At present there isn't any one, so you needn't worry."

Bonnie tried to smile. "You've been very good to me," she said earnestly.

The nurse went out to look after some of her duties. Half an hour later she came back to Bonnie's room, tiptoed to the bed and bent over in the dim light to see if her patient was all right. Then she drew back sharply.

The bed was empty!

She turned on the light and looked all around. There was no one else in the room! Bonnie was gone!

CHAPTER XIII

WILDLY the nurse searched the room. Bonnie's shabby clothes were no longer hanging on the hooks! She rushed to the window and looked helplessly along the fire-escape into the court-yard below, where the ambulance was just bringing in a fresh case. There was no sign of her patient. Turning back, she saw on the table a bit of paper folded up and pinned together with a quaint little circle of old-fashioned gold. The note was addressed, "Miss Wright, Nurse." A five-dollar bill fell from the paper. The nurse picked it up and read:

> DEAR NURSE:—I am leaving this little pin for you because you have been so good to me. It isn't very valuable, but it is all I have. The five dollars is for the room. I know it is worth more, but I haven't any more just now. You have all been very kind. Please give the money to the doctor and thank him for me. Don't worry about me; I am all right. I just need to get back to work.
> Good-by, and thank you again,
> Sincerely,
> ROSE BONNIE BRENTWOOD.

The nurse rushed down to the office. A search was instituted at once. Every one in the office and halls was questioned.

They searched the streets for several blocks around. It had been only a few minutes, and the girl was weak. She could not have gone far! But no Bonnie was found!

That evening mail came bringing a letter with a Western postmark for Miss R. B. Brentwood. The nurse looked at it sadly. What hope and friendliness might it not contain! If it had only come a couple of hours sooner!

Later that evening, when it was finally settled that the patient had really escaped, the nurse telephoned to Courtland.

Courtland's anger rose as he listened to the details of Gila's visit. Of course the nurse was exaggerating, but how crude of Gila! But, after all, perhaps the nurse had not understood fully. Perhaps she had taken offense and misconstrued Gila's intended kindness! Well, the main thing was that Bonnie was gone and must be hunted up. It wouldn't do to leave her without friends, sick and weak, this cold night. She had, of course, gone home to her room. He could easily find her.

"I'll go right down to her old place and see if she's there," he told the nurse. "Certainly I shall insist that she return to the hospital to-night."

As he hung up the receiver Pat touched his elbow and pointed to a messenger-boy waiting for him with a note.

IT was Gila's violet-scented missive, over which she had wept those angry tears. Somehow the perfume annoyed him. He put the thing in his pocket, and went hurriedly down the hall.

As he passed the office Courtland found a letter in his box, noting with a sort of comfort that it bore a Western postmark.

In the trolley he opened Mother Marshall's letter and read, marveling at the revelation of motherhood it contained.

A factory-girl, belated, shivered into the car in a thin summer jacket and stood beside a girl in furs and a handsome coat. Courtland thought of Bonnie in her little shabby black suit—a summer suit, of course. He remembered noticing how thin it looked as they stood beside the grave on the bleak hillside and wondered if she were not cold.

He sprang up the narrow stairs that had grown so familiar to him the past week, watching anxiously the crack under the door to see if there was a light. But it was all dark!

A light appeared under the door of the front room, the door opened a crack, and a frowsy head was thrust out, with a candle held high above it.

"Has Miss Brentwood returned? Have you seen her?" he asked.

"Not as I knows on, she 'ain't come," said a woman's voice. "I went to bed early. She might ov and I not hear her, she's so softly like."

"I wonder if we could find out? Would you mind coming and trying?"

The woman looked at him keenly. "Oh, you're the young feller what come to the fun'rul, ain't you?" The woman came in an amazing costume of many colors, and called and shook the door. She got her key and unlocked the door, stepping cautiously inside and looking about. There was no sign of Bonnie! Her room was just as she had left it on the day of the funeral!

Where was Bonnie Brentwood?

CHAPTER XIV

SUDDENLY, as Courtland stood in the narrow, dark street alone and in uncertainty, he was no longer alone. As clearly as if he felt a touch upon his sleeve he knew that One was there beside him, and that this errand he was upon had the sanction of that Presence which had met him once in the fiery way and promised to show him what to do.

"God, show me where to find her!" he ejaculated, and then, as if one had said: "Come with me!" he turned and walked up the street. That is, they walked up the street.

Always in thinking of that walk afterward he thought of it as "they walking up the street"—himself and the Presence.

It came to him that he would like to go everywhere in such company; that no journey would be too far or arduous, no duty too unpleasant if all could be as this.

He stepped into the telephone office and began calling up hospitals. There were one or two that reported young women brought in, but the description was not at all like the girl of whom he was in search. He jotted them down in his note-book, however, with a feeling that they might be a last resort.

As he turned the pages of the phone-book his eye caught the name of the city's morgue, and a sudden horror froze into his mind. What if something had happened to her and she had been taken there?

He rang up the morgue sharply and put tense, eager questions.

Yes, a young woman had been brought in about an hour ago. . . . Yes, dressed in black—had long light hair and was slender. Some looker!" the man who answered the phone said.

Courtland shuddered and hung up. He felt that he must go to the morgue.

When they entered the gruesome place of the unknown dead, although the Presence entered with him, yet he felt that it was there already, standing close among the dead; had been there when they came in!

AN inward shudder went through him as he was led to the spot where lay the latest comer, a slim young girl with long golden hair, sodden from the river where she had been found, her pretty face sharpened and coarsened by sin.

He drew a deep breath of relief and turned away quickly from the sight of her poor drowned eyes, rejoicing that they had not been the eyes of Bonnie. It was terrible to think of Bonnie lying so, all drenched and her spirit put out. He was glad he might still think of her alive, and go on searching for her. But a dart of pain went through his heart as he looked again at this little wreck of womanhood, going out of a life that had dealt hardly with her; where she had reached for brightness and pleasure, and had found ashes and bitterness instead. What would the resurrection mean to a poor little soul like that? Perhaps it had not all been her fault! Perhaps there were others who had helped push her down, smug in self-righteousness, to whom the resurrection would be more of a horror than to the pretty ignorant child whose untaught feet had strayed into forbidden paths! It was good to go out from there knowing that the pretty, sinful girl, the hardened, grizzled sot, the poor old toothless crone, the little hunchback newsboy who lay in the same row, were guarded alike, and beloved by the same Presence that would go with him.

Around the little newsboy huddled a group of street gamins, counting out their few pennies, and talking excitedly of how they would buy him some flowers. There were tear-stains down their grimy cheeks and it was plain they were pitying him, they who had perhaps yet to tread the paths of sin and deprivation and sorrow for many long years. And the Presence there! So near them with the pitying eyes! If the children could only see! He felt a great ache in himself to go out and shout to all the world to look up and see the Presence that was in their midst, and they saw Him not!

As he passed out into the street once more, he murmured softly under his breath: "God, if You are really there let me find her!"

AND yet if any had asked him just then if he ever prayed he would have told them no. Prayer was to him a thing utterly apart from this cry of his soul, this longing for an understanding with God.

He was walking in the general direction of the Good Samaritan Hospital, just as any one would walk with a friend through a strange place and accommodate his going to the man who was guiding him.

The night lowered! the stars were not on duty. A cold wind from the river swept around corners, reminding him of the dripping yellow hair of the girl in the morgue. It cut like a knife through Courtland's heavy overcoat and made him wish he had brought his muffler. He stuffed his gloved hands into his pockets. Even in their fur linings they were stiff and cold. He thought of the girl's little light serge jacket and shivered.

The lights were out in most of the houses, for it was growing late. There were not quite so many saloons. The streets loomed wide ahead, the line of houses dark on the left, and the stretch of vacant lots, with the river beyond on the right.

On ahead a couple of blocks the light flung out on the pavement and marked another saloon. Bright doors swung back and forth. The intermittent throb of a piano and twang of a violin, making merry with the misery of the world; voices brokenly above it all came at intervals, loudly as the way drew nearer.

The saloon doors swung again, and four or five dark figures jostled noisily out and came haltingly down the street. They walked crazily, like ships without a rudder, veering from one side of the walk to the other, shouting and singing uncouth, ribald songs, hoarse laughter interspersed with scattered oaths.

The figures paused before one of the dark houses, pointed and laughed; went nearer to the steps and stooped.

"Wake up!" floated out into the silence once. And again, "No, you don't, my pretty little chicken!"

Then a girl's scream pierced the night and something darted out from the darkness of the door-step, eluding the drunken men, but slipped and fell!

Courtland broke into a noiseless run.

THE men had scrambled tipsily after the girl and clutched her. They lifted her unsteadily and surrounded her! She screamed again, and dashed this way and that blindly, but they met her every time and held her.

Courtland, lowering his head and crouching, came swiftly forward, watching carefully where he steered, and coming straight at two of the men with his powerful shoulders. It was an old trick of the football field and it bowled the two assailants on the right straight out into the gutter. The other three made a dash at him, but he sidestepped one and tripped him; a blow on the point of the chin sent another sprawling on the sidewalk; but the last one, who was perhaps the most sober of them all, showed fight and called to his comrades to come on and get this stranger who was trying to steal their girl. The language he used made Courtland's blood boil. He struck the fellow across his foul mouth, and then, clenching with him, went down upon the sidewalk. His antagonist was a heavier man than he was, but the steady brain and the trained muscles had the better of it from the first, and in a moment more the drunken man was choking and limp.

Courtland rose and looked about. The two fellows in the gutter were struggling to their feet with loud threats, and the fellow on the sidewalk was staggering toward him. They would be upon the girl again in a moment. He looked toward her, as she stood trembling a few feet away from him, too frightened to try to run, not daring to leave her protector. A street light fell directly upon her white face. It was Bonnie Brentwood!

Snatching up the girl like a baby, Courtland fled up the street and around the first corner, and all that cursing, drunken, reeling five came howling after!

American Y. M. C. A. in England

THE American Y. M. C. A. took over and rushed to completion a large "hut" which was being built for British troops at Aldwych on the Strand, opposite Somerset House. This "hut" will provide lodgings, meals and recreation for enlisted men and officers. It will provide sleeping accommodations for over 350 men, will be equipped with café, writing- and reading-rooms, and a soda fountain. A "hut" is a temporary building of wood or sheet steel, usually about thirty or forty feet wide and from sixty to eighty feet long. There is a "quiet room" for study classes, for reading, and for devotional services. In the city "huts" there are also large dormitories with excellent sleeping accommodation. The London "hut" is just across the river from Waterloo Station.

A committee of representative Americans residing in London has been formed to cooperate in this work for our troops. Cooperating with this committee is a committee of American ladies. This committee has charge of forming parties of American women to assist in the "canteen" work at the "hut," and in arranging for the entertainment of our men at social functions in the homes of members of the American colony. There are now from seventy to eighty American secretaries working in Europe with the British forces or in advance work for our troops. The chief of representatives of the American Association in Europe are E. C. Carter and D. A. Davis, with temporary offices at 45 Bedford Square, London, W.C.1, and at 31 Avenue Montaigne, Paris.

Three million dollars have already been subscribed for this work in the United States.

Ezra's Return from Babylon

International Sunday School Lesson for October 28

Ezra 8 : 15-36

The Coming of a Timely Leader

INTO the weak and struggling community which centered about the restored temple came a real leader, a great and compelling personality, a "man sent of God," even as in every needy age the Almighty raises up his ambassadors to the world. This was Ezra, the priest, the scribe. His double title in the book is composed of two words that have often fallen into disrepute. But this man was a true priest, an intercessor for his people, bearing their sins and needs upon his heart, and in turn urging the claims of Jehovah upon them. And, moreover, he was a true scribe, a lover of Holy Scriptures, no merely mechanical copyist, but one who drew new inspiration and guidance from the old truths.

Unless one studies the history in detail, he fails to notice the transition from the completion of the temple to the coming of Ezra, which leaves a blank of fifty years and more. There are many puzzles for Bible experts in these old chronicles. For example: what became of Zerubbabel, the prince of the house of David, who had aroused such enthusiasm in Haggai and Zechariah? Many had almost identified him with the promised Messiah, and he seems to have been a good and wise governor. But he disappears unnoted.

However, it is clear that the Jewish community remained weak and poverty-stricken, and the time was a time of decadence. Once more we have a new impetus coming from faraway Babylon, where there is a reservoir of Jewish strength in the midst of a pagan land. Thence come these leaders and helpers, men prosperous and learned, who had profited by the high culture and wonderful civilization of the greatest nation of that time without being corrupted by its heathenism and immorality.

Ezra's Preparation for His Work

Ezra had enjoyed the advantages of Babylon and stood in high favor with the genial king known as Artaxerxes the Longhanded. Moreover, his family had the highest traditions of loyalty and service. His genealogy in Chapter 7 may be taken from his own records, and shows the fine influence that the honor of a good name may have in a man's life.

Ezra was versed in the law of Moses from his youth. He was also brought up under the influence of the great writings of Ezekiel, which were treasured and studied by the Babylonish Jews for generations.

Great advantages nobly used! Boys and girls of godly families, in Christian schools, surrounded by the advantages of our great free land, are you living up to your wonderful opportunities?

Here was a man of deep religious mind who became a statesmanlike reformer. Faith and common sense were hand in hand, coupled with a fearless obedience to the dictates of conscience. He put his heart into the study of the law, meditating, brooding over its precious truths. He was zeal itself in his enthusiasm. He was also far-sighted and practical in planning to apply and carry out the statutes and the judgments of Jehovah.

I shall never forget the saying of a missionary builder: "Piety alone will no more make a successful missionary than a successful navigator." Pioneers like Ezra and our heroic Careys, Judsons and Livingstones need first of all to be men of God, wholly consecrated, but also to be well trained in the Scriptures, men of education and breadth, practical men, who keep their feet on the ground while seeing visions in the sky.

"Ezra had set his heart to seek the law of Jehovah and to do it, and to teach in Israel." There is the proper procedure: the sincere desire of the heart, the earnest endeavor of the life, and afterward the guidance of others out of unimpeachable experience and conviction. It reminds one of Paul's advice to the Philippians after his catalogue of the best in life: "Think on these things." You remember how in the next verse he goes on to say, "These things do;" and like Ezra is able to add "The things which ye not only learned and received but also heard and saw in me" (Phil. 4 : 8, 9).

This was the man who rallied a company of about 1,600 Babylonian Jews to attempt a dangerous journey of hundreds of miles across the desert with the object of bringing new zeal and hope to the rubbish-filled, straggling city that had once been Solomon's gorgeous capital. By the generosity of the king the prudent leader had provided money, supplies, temple equipment, and authority to carry out the provisions of the law.

The pilgrims gathered at Ahava and kept a solemn fast of three days before beginning their long trip. Ezra made good use of his time to imbue them all with his own courageous and prayerful spirit, making them see the venture as an act of worship, giving to the leaders their share of responsibility for the safe delivery of the offerings for the temple. Thus he bound them in a covenant and gave them a palladium, a precious charge to each group of marchers. "Ye are holy unto Jehovah, and the vessels are holy; and the silver and the gold are a free-will offering unto Jehovah the God of your fathers. Watch ye and keep them."

Wise leader, who gave to each his stewardship! Wise Christian workers today who see to it that every man, woman and child has a task and a share in the Church of God!

Now Ezra faced a puzzling dilemma. Should he ask for a military escort to guard them from the wild Arabs of the desert? If he did not, the whole expedition might fall victims to robbers and the offerings be lost. If he did, he felt that he lowered the tone of the whole enterprise from an act of faith to a reliance upon horses and chariots. After the noble words of trust in God that he had uttered in his last interview with King Artaxerxes, he was ashamed to send back word for soldiers. Put yourself in his place. What would you do?

After his three days of prayerful preparation, only one answer entered Ezra's mind. He would make it an out-and-out venture of faith. God alone should be his shield and defense. He would rather take an additional risk than seem to manifest doubt concerning his enterprise. It may not be according to the wisdom of this world, but it was an act typical of the man, a piece of real heroism and faith, and it did much to make the expedition a spiritual success.

Ezra shows us how a modern church can have good, careful business and financial management and still above all else manifest faith in God, who has founded it for his own good purpose. There are times when we all have to risk something for the Kingdom of Christ, to launch out on the deep, to leave all and follow Jesus. "Safety first" is no motto for the church.

An Uneventful Journey

Though some hearts may have quaked, the journey was absolutely uneventful. How often God is better than our fears! How often the lions, which we saw in the way, are chained when we boldly march on! How often, when there are dangers, real and terrible, "the hand of our God is upon us and he delivers us from the hand of the enemy and the lier-in-wait by the way."

Ezra rightly recorded in his diary that God had saved them just as truly as if by a miracle He had intervened in some unequal battle. Let us be like Ezra in acknowledging the quiet commonplace providence of our Father during the greater part of our journey to the Heavenly City.

After three days of rest and glad reunions, the pilgrims gathered in the court of the temple and rendered an account of their stewardship. By number and by weight the vessels and the gold were delivered complete. Not one man had proved a traitor; not one Judas had yielded to covetousness; all had come in with the Lord's treasure. So when our life journey is over and we gather before the altar of God, may we have lost nothing that was entrusted to us. Let us be especially careful of our stewardship of money, for Jesus said, "If ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?"

Ezra's Prayer

We have in Chapter 9, verses 5 to 15, a beautiful prayer of intercession, apparently copied from the actual diary of this godly man. Read it over carefully, for it is a great privilege to overhear a real saint upon his knees before God. The problem of mixed marriages is a vexed one today, but it was sorer then. Ezra felt that the great distinctive principles of Judaism, the law itself indeed, might eventually be lost by an intermixture with the heathenish tribes around Judah. He had plenty of illustrations in Hebrew history of the power of idolaters to lead Israelites astray.

But get to the heart of his spirit and method in prayer, and not merely to the petition of the hour. There is a wonderful identifying of himself with his nation, a splendid sweeping in all Israel with him nearer to the throne of grace, a deep moral fervor for righteousness and a conviction that God is holy and severe. Profound confession for sin is here, but through it flashes the joy of gratitude for restoration and opportunity.

"We are bondmen; yet our God hath not forsaken us in our bondage, but hath extended loving kindness unto us . . . to give us a reviving, to set up the house of our God, and to repair the ruins thereof, and to give us a wall in Judah and Jerusalem. And now, O our God, what shall we say after this? For we have forsaken thy commandments, which thou hast commanded by thy servants the prophets."

One Need of Intercessors

This is the attitude of the men of faith in our day also. God is good. Despite all our sinning and the ruin that results, in his mercy, he extends us new chances. But again and again our nation, our people, or our church, forsakes the great standards set up by the prophets: Justice, Righteousness, Mercy, Humility. In such emergency the effectual fervent prayer of righteous men availeth much.

Put on the whole armor of God. Like Ezra, make the most of every agency of service, Babylonian or Jewish; like him, take the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, "with all prayer and supplication praying at all seasons in the Spirit, and watching thereunto in all perseverance and supplication for all the saints." This is the way to redeem the time when the days are evil.

The Call of Heroism

The Jerusalem of Ezra's day was somber enough. The low-water mark of national humiliation had not yet been forgotten. The outlook was anything but promising to the timid or the indolent. But this man created his opportunity from the very need of the hour. Always, always the call for heroes rings through the world. Never more so than in our wonderful and terrible times. Something is radically wrong with us, if we do not find or make a way to serve God and the nation.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

How to Get the Parents in the Sunday School

IT is necessary to get the parents, for the sake of the parents themselves, the scholars and the school. The parents, in the majority of cases, need Bible training in order to do their duty by their children at home. Their attendance at Sunday school will help hold the children there. There can be no effective teaching by the Sunday school unless the parents know the school and can cooperate in the homework of the scholar.

The Mormon Church thinks so highly of the necessity of training parents as instructors of their own children, that parents' classes are provided as a part of the regular Sunday school session. Twenty thousand Mormon parents meet in these classes weekly and study a course for parents.

In order to win the parents, the first necessity is a Parents' Department. This should have a superintendent, the same as other departments. His or her aim should be to reach every parent of the school with a call or message. These parents should be invited into special classes, or be related to the Home Department. The superintendent of the Parents' Department will supervise the lesson courses, arrange parents' libraries, provide social gatherings, and at such gatherings provide an exhibit of the children's Sunday school lesson work.

Parents' Classes

It will not be difficult in any community to get parents together for mutual help, for the problems are similar and pressing. It will be best, wherever possible, to group these parents according to their interests. Teachers for such classes are often found among the parents themselves.

Suggested classes are classes of young parents. In the Moody School of Chicago there is a class of seventy-five young parents, who come at times with their children. These children, if babies, are cared for in the nursery of the church during the lesson. In another school, the young babies of two and three years are gathered about a table, while a very simple lesson is taught them and their little hands are kept busy drawing some design with crayon. The mothers of these babies were gathered nearby in a Bible class of their own.

Then, if there are enough children for a Beginners' Class (three to five), their parents may be made into a class and the parents of primary children likewise.

Where the school is small, all the parents of children up to nine or twelve may be made into one class.

Classes of Fathers and Mothers of Adolescents

These parents have special problems, as every parent of boys and girls in their teens knows. The fathers and mothers should have separate classes, if possible. These classes can take up the regular lesson, or a special Bible course, and then occasionally discuss the boy and girl question together. Books for such discussion are suggested. Sometimes these parents may be able to meet for a week-day discussion.

COURSE OF STUDY FOR CLASSES OF YOUNG PARENTS:

"A Study of Child Nature" (Harrison).
"Child Nature and Child Nurture" (St. John).
"Childhood" (Burney).
"The Dawn of Character" (Mumford).

"Training the Boy" (McKeever).
"Brothering the Boy" (Rafferty).
"The Coming Generation" (Forbush).
"Marching Manward" (Beck).
"Boy Training" (Alexander).

FOR CLASSES OF MOTHERS OF ADOLESCENT GIRLS:

"The Girl in Her Teens" (Slattery).
"Boy and Girl" (Fish).
"The Girl and Her Religion" (Slattery)
"The Essentials of Character" (Sesson).
"Training the Girl" (McKeever).

Millions of Teeth
Are Wrecked by a Film

By Wm. M. Ruthrauff, A.B., A.M.
All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Many Diseases
Now Traced to It

The wrecker of teeth is a slimy film—the film that you feel with your tongue.

It clings to the teeth, resisting ordinary brushing. It gets into crevices and stays.

It causes nearly all tooth troubles. It absorbs stains, so teeth discolor. It hardens into tartar. It holds food particles which ferment and form acid—the cause of all decay.

Being albuminous, it forms an ideal breeding place for germs. Millions of germs are always present in it. These germs, together with tartar, form the chief cause of pyorrhea. When pyorrhea starts, they enter the blood. And many serious diseases are now traced to mouth infection.

Old-time brushing methods do not end that film. Teeth still discolor and decay. Tartar still accumulates. Tooth decay and pyorrhea are common. A vigorous dental cleaning, every little while, is usually essential.

All this, despite your daily brushing. So the evidence is that your methods are wrong. They simply remove the debris.

Use a Digestant

That film is albuminous, which fact suggested the use of a digestant.

Pepsin digests albumin, but pepsin alone is inert. It must be activated. But the usual activating agent — an acid—is harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed barred.

But invention has supplied a harmless method of activating it. It is now combined with pepsin in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. Five governments have granted patents on the combination.

The object is to dissolve that film. Then to keep it constantly dissolved. And three years of clinical tests seem to prove that it means an end to film.

We supply a One-Week tube, so you may judge the results for yourself. Send the coupon for it. Use it like other tooth pastes. Mark how clean your teeth feel. Note how they whiten as the film disappears.

One week of Pepsodent will be a revelation. You will see that it does what was not done before. And we do not believe you will ever return to any useless method of teeth cleaning.

Don't Avoid Corns

But Don't Keep Them

With dainty footwear, corns can hardly be avoided. But they matter little when you know the way to end them.

As soon as a corn starts, attach a Blue-jay and forget it. The corn will never pain. In two days, if it is a new corn, it will disappear. Sometimes old corns need a second application.

It is almost as simple as removing a dirt spot. Blue-jay is applied in a jiffy. It fits the toe like a glove. When you remove it—in 48 hours—the whole corn is done for. Blue-jay is a scientific method. A noted chemist invented it, and a famous laboratory prepares it.

It is not mussy, it is not harsh. It centers action on the corn alone, so it doesn't lead to soreness.

And it is sure. No corn can resist it. Its millions of users have no dread of corns.

For your own sake, prove it on one corn.

See how easily these kill-joys can be ended.

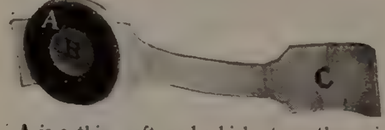
How Blue-jay Acts



A is a thin, soft pad which stops the pain by relieving the pressure.

B is the B&B wax, which gently undermines the corn. Usually it takes only 48 hours to end the corn completely.

C is rubber adhesive which sticks without wetting. It wraps around the toe, and makes the plaster snug and comfortable.

Blue-jay is applied in a jiffy. After that, one doesn't feel the corn. The action is gentle, and applied to the corn alone. So the corn disappears without soreness.

of this unprecedented adventure in democracy will largely hang the issue of the war. For us there is no threat of privation. We wish only that our people should eat plenty, but wisely and without waste.

LA FOLLETTE ACCUSED. Resolutions adopted by the Public Safety Commission of Minnesota calling for the expulsion from the Senate of Senator La Follette were presented to the Senate on September 29 by Senator Kellogg of Minnesota. Similar resolutions were received from the Washburn Loyalty League of Washburn, Wisconsin, and other patriotic organizations through the country have urged the Senate to take action: In the Minnesota resolutions, Senator La Follette is accused of having given the expression to disloyal utterances. The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. A sub committee of five was authorized to conduct an inquiry as to the accuracy of the charges and to report at the next session of Congress. Senator La Follette was heard by the Senate in his own defense on October 6 in the closing hours of the special session of Congress.

SOLDIERS' CHRISTMAS MAIL. The Postmaster General announced on October 3 that packages for the troops in France, intended to reach them by Christmas, must be mailed not later than November 15. Every package must bear conspicuously the words "Christmas Mail," the complete address of the person for whom it is intended, and in the upper left-hand corner the name and address of the sender. Every parcel must be so wrapped and addressed as to permit easy inspection by the postmaster. The rate of postage will be 12 cents per pound.

PREPARING FOR PEACE. Although feeling that the war may last for two years, President Wilson has assigned to Colonel E. M. House and Justice Brandeis the work of preparing for America's part in the peace conference. It is said that Justice Brandeis is studying all the multiplied and involved problems of Eastern Europe while Colonel House is preparing himself to meet any question which may arise regarding the west.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Secretary Baker announced on October 1 that negro troops would be trained at all cantonments. . . . The Consumers' League is again making an appeal to the people of the country to "do your Christmas shopping early," . . . The War Department has recommended and Congress has provided for the revival of the grade of General in order to provide suitable rank for Major General John J. Pershing. The Chief of Staff in Washington will also have the rank of General, while the corps commanders will be given the rank of Lieutenant General. In the history of the Union only four army officers have held the title of General—Washington, Grant, Sherman and Sheridan. . . . It was announced on October 2 that American colleges in Turkey had been reopened. Conditions in Smyrna were said to be better, and the college reopened October 1. Robert College opened with 300 pupils, and the girls' college had an enrolment up to its full capacity. . . . Secretary Baker on October 4 announced that the War Department had let contracts for the construction of 20,000 airplanes for use in the war against Germany, of which all but 5,000 are being built in this country. The Secretary said that aviators were being trained in twenty-four flying schools and in a number of ground schools, and that the first shipment of airplanes would be made within a reasonable time.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THERE was practically no fighting of any importance whatever on either the Russian or Rumanian fronts during the week ending October 5. But the internal situation in Russia has been of very great interest, which is centered around the proceedings of the Congress which was in session all the week at Petrograd. Kerensky made an address before this Congress on its opening day; but thereafter proceeded at once from words to deeds, and announced that he had decided on the immediate formation of a coalition Cabinet. As the Congress had not at this time voted on the question, this action was considered a direct defiance to it. However, when the question came up whether or not the Congress would approve the acts of Kerensky in constituting such a cabinet, approval was given by a very small majority. Almost immediately thereafter this action was reconsidered by the Congress with many numbers absent and the vote was, by a large majority, against the formation of a coalition cabinet and demanded that the new cabinet be selected from the extreme radical party only. This action placed the Congress and the provisional government in direct opposition to each other.

THE British Admiralty reported eleven ships of over 1,600 tons and two of less tonnage sunk during the week by the submarines. This is the lowest record.

During the week, London was raided five times from the air. As far as known, the results were not particularly important, and the casualties, in point of number, were insignificant. The French raided several of the interior cities of Germany in the same manner during the week.

In Mesopotamia there was some really serious fighting. Here the British made an attack on the Turkish position at Ramadie, on the Euphrates river, about sixty miles west of Bagdad. This attack began on Friday, September 28, by the capture from the Turks of the Mushaid Ridge. On Saturday the British resumed their attack on the town and claim to have taken four thousand prisoners, including the Turkish general and his staff.

During the early portion of the week the Austro-Italian front was quiet. But on September 30, on the southeastern edge of the Bainsizza plateau, the Italians delivered a strong attack on the Austrian positions south of Podlaca and southeast of Madoni, and severe fighting followed. The Austrians were driven from their position. A violent counter-attack recovered a small portion of the lost ground.

ON the western front, in the Ypres sector, the English opened an offensive on September 27, on a line running from north of the Roulers road to the south of the Menin road, a distance of about eight miles. The British objectives in the series of offensives which they have recently made on this Ypres front are the crests of the low hills which face Ypres on the east. The offensive began on Thursday. On the Menin road the advance was pushed as far east as Hollebeke, which was captured. On the Roulers road, the British rush carried them to the outskirts of Zonnebeke, while in the center between the roads the hamlet of Polderhoek was the limit of the advance eastward. This advance, however, was not made without overcoming a most desperate resistance by the Germans, in which both sides suffered heavily. After a couple of comparatively calm days, one of the violent artillery duels of the war began and continued unabatedly day and night until October 5. On this day the British again attacked on a long front, gaining ground to a depth of a mile and a half east of Zonnebeke and advancing somewhat along a front of eight miles.

On the French portion of the front there was the usual artillery fighting. On the north front of Verdun, near Samogneux, during the middle of the week, the Germans made a vicious thrust at the French positions and after a determined fight captured some 1,200 yards of front line trenches.

Uruguay severed relations with Germany on October 7.

men, the offer of unheard-of wages, and the extraordinary methods employed for obtaining unskilled help, these men were unable to secure employment. Perhaps it was because of their physical incapacity, or their shabby appearance, or because they looked old or decrepit that no man would hire them. But a few weeks at the farm, congenially employed, breathing pure air, eating wholesome food, enjoying regular hours of sleep and recreation, and, above all, being treated with Christian courtesy and brotherliness, have made them men again, and they have gone to permanent positions with every prospect of success. In the meantime the splendid crops, which have been declared by local farmers to be the equal of anything in the county or State, have been secured by the efforts of men flung remorselessly upon the economic scrap-heap, who otherwise would have continued to be a burden on the back of the community in the shape of paupers, criminals, or lunatics.

The new light thrown upon our work by the realization that there is little left to us but the absolutely destitute has convinced us that more than ever the principle of brotherhood as taught by Christ must be our controlling idea.

These men must not be treated as malefactors or delinquents, but as brothers. To these homeless men the Mission must be more than ever a home. Hitherto we have directed our efforts to benefiting the members of our Brotherhood, but steps are being taken to bring to the promiscuous crowd who attend our meetings some realization of the advantages of a healthy social life.

To this end, a Women's Auxiliary is in course of formation. The Home Circle will embrace godly, gifted, and sympathetic women of Greater New York and the suburbs. They will be invited to attend regular stated meetings for the purpose of meeting, entertaining in a social way, and cheering up really homeless men. We have missed exceedingly the inspiration which the late Mother Bird always brought, but we have the promise of such help from many other earnest and tender-hearted women. The National Circle will comprise women friends and sympathizers in other parts of the country, who know of the work through the Christian Herald, and will help us in sending cast-off clothing, as well as by their prayers and messages of cheer.

Any women reading these lines will be enrolled as members of the movement, if they will communicate with the Christian Herald office or the Bowery Mission.

The work of the Farm has been such a success that it has been decided to consolidate the Labor Settlement with it. The work of the Settlement has therefore been transferred to Dunwoodie Station at the eastern extremity of the City of Yonkers.

The following is, therefore, the splendid chain of helpful activities employed by the Mission in the work of uplifting fallen men: The Nightly Meetings, the Brotherhood, the Women's Auxiliary, the Winners' Club, the Free Labor Bureau, the Mission Industries, the Farm at Yorktown Heights, N. Y., and the Dunwoodie Industrial Department.

It is perhaps unnecessary, but I cannot forbear reminding Christian Herald readers of the fact that the fundamental work of the Mission is spiritual. Work, food, home comforts, social entertainment, are all essential to complete manhood, but everything will be of but little avail unless a man's spiritual faculties are awakened and his spiritual wants supplied. As on every evening in its thirty-eight years' history, the Bowery Mission workers continue to bring their charges into the spiritual presence of Him who said, "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

TOMORROW'S CAR FOR YOU TODAY

OAKLAND puts forth this new Sensible Six in the firm conviction that it is the forerunner of the type of automobile which soon shall command America.

As a car it pioneers that valuable union of high power, light weight, great comfort and fixed economy toward which the sensible motorist is surely turning.

Proper design has contrived a full 106 inches of body room upon the 112-inch wheelbase of this new Sensible Six.

F. O. B. Pontiac, Mich.

It is above all things an automobile built to be used—to be enjoyed as well as to be admired.

It is for the man who wants in his motor car an efficiency on which he can always rely, at a cost which will serve rather than enslave him.

The overhead-valve motor in this new Oakland is of special design, simple and compact, delivering at 2600 r. p. m., 44 h. p., or one full working horse-power to every 48 pounds of car weight.

It is exceedingly sparing of fuel, and because of its extremely light weight the car is surprisingly easy on tires.

The sightly and spacious body of the new Oakland is swung on specially graded springs of unusual comfort, and is upholstered in genuine leather.

Only the soundest manufacturing principles coupled with unmatched buying power could produce this value at so moderate a price as $990.

Questions and Answers

I. G. L., Waverly, N. Y. I read in the Editorial Forum of the Christian Herald that which I have been looking for for some time. I mean a request for some expression from the Christian people of the country as to a day of National Prayer. A call from the head of our government for such a day and time is greatly needed. It is not enough that a few people pray and call upon God. God deals with the rulers of nations in great crises like this. As you say, "God loves to see a nation on its knees, for national pardon and repentance of national sins." Prosperity and great wealth have in the past ages proved the downfall of nations and kingdoms, for they forgot God and went on in their own way. God was not in all their thoughts. The people have responded to the call of our government as to planting and sowing for greater food production. Man, by his own effort in most cases, has failed to bring much increase. Excessive rains, with much frost, have ruined crops in nine states. More than one-half or quite one-half of the potatoes decayed in a vast section of the country. Milk and butter with many other articles of food are rising in price. If God does not give the increase, but little is gained.

A resolution introduced by Senator Myers of Montana is now before Congress, requesting the President to designate a day of National Prayer for Divine aid in the war.

L. O., Deposit, N. Y., sends this little prayer, which will find an echo in many hearts in these war-times: "Dear God, help me to be careful how I spend my words, my time and substance. Help me to be quick to see the needs of little children, of the aged, the suffering and afflicted. Keep my sight clear of criticism. Open, I pray thee, the pathway of thrift and service, that I may enter in and follow the precepts of thy son, our Lord Jesus Christ, in whose name I ask it all. Amen."

G. D. D., Hampton, N. H., writes: "In my residence in a Southern city (1859–62), I do not recall hearing the word 'temperance,' certainly not 'prohibition.' But when, in 1862, dealers sold drink to men in gray uniform contrary to orders, their whole stock of liquors was dumped into the gutter. That was business, not sentiment. It is bad to put good grain into poison alcohol; but isn't it far worse to put poison alcohol into boys and men? Is that either good judgment or good morals?

"'Tobacco and booze God's image mar
Coffee and tea first cousins are,
Water and milk are good enough,
But cut out all the harmful stuff!'"

This from an old subscriber of the Christian Herald, who witnessed the surrender of Fort Sumter and lived in the same room with Jefferson Davis in Montgomery in 1861, is interesting, particularly at the present time, when the government is exerting itself in the interests of good morals and temperance in the army and navy.

A. R. M., Indianapolis, Ind. Is it customary for a speaker at a meeting to indulge in laughter in the midst of an address? I attended an assembly where a speaker laughed so much that it was difficult to understand what was said. The Bible says, "There is a time to laugh."

There may be occasions when a laugh on the part of a speaker might be overlooked, but it is generally regarded as better form to speak plainly and let the audience do the laughing. Even professional humorists rarely smile, though their auditors may be convulsed with laughter. A speaker who tells an anecdote or makes a point which is calculated to excite mirth, usually has the good taste to let the appreciation come spontaneously from the hearers.

Mrs. L. D., Mendowi, Wash. The story of the vision of angels on the battlefield of Mons, to which you refer, has long since been exploded by the published statement of the author that it was purely a romance of the imagination, which he never intended to be accepted as fact. The Christian Herald published this information over a year ago.

J. W., Roxbury, Mass. Many conjectures are made concerning the application of Rev. 13 : 18. Some authorities hold that Balaam the false prophet was meant; others believe it to refer to Papal Rome; still others regard it as referring to apostasy within the church—a triple falling away. Read Dr. Gray's comments on the subject in the series of articles appearing in the Christian Herald.

The Christian Herald has received from an old friend, who signs himself "B," a draft for forty dollars, to be applied wholly to the work for children at Mont-Lawn.

D. A. E., Denver, Colo. 1. About fifty years old. 2. Of the state church of Germany, viz., a modified Lutheranism. 3 and 4. Only in a measure like ours, in that there is universal male suffrage.

Miss M. M. F., Onondaga Hill, N. Y. Peter's death is not recorded in the Scriptures, although the passage in John 21 : 18 is generally interpreted as foreshadowing it. He was crucified in Rome in the fourteenth year of Nero's reign, according to Eusebius, or about A. D. 68.

A. V. T. C., Owens Crossroads, Ala. 1. "Neurotic" is a medical term now in common use. It refers to diseases of the nervous system or to any substance specially affecting the nervous system. 2. "Co-ed" is an abbreviated form of "coeducation," and may be used in speaking of a person who advocates the inclusion of both sexes in the same classes in higher schools and universities.

N. O. C., Petaluma, Calif., writes: "I have been reading with great interest your articles on 'Driving Out the Booze from the Camps' of our soldier boys. I hope, with God's help, this will be done; but there is another evil which is almost as great, namely, gambling. I have two nephews who have enlisted, one in the coast artillery and the other in the field artillery. They are only boys. One is at Fort Schofield, Honolulu. He says boys there have even gambled with matches. Our boy don't gamble. We are so anxious to keep our boys—not only ours but all of the boys—as pure as when they left home, with God's help."

H. H., Cedar Spring, Mo. Nicholas Lewis Count von Zinzendorf was born in Dresden in 1700. He was the founder of the sect known as Herrnhuters or Moravian Brethren. According to his own account, he conceived the desire, while he was still very young, of forming a society of believers. Ten years after taking the first step, and when he was about thirty, he had a following of over 600, all of whom were subject to ecclesiastical discipline that was almost monastic in character. Soon the missionary zeal of the founder began to make itself felt. Missionaries were sent to many different lands, from the arctic circle to the equator. The movement became a far-reaching and powerful one, and its spiritual force was unquestioned. It is said that Wesley was indebted to the inspiration he received during a sojourn at Herrnhut for many of the ideas which afterward took shape as Methodism. Zinzendorf's early religious surroundings were of the strictest kind. He was brought up in the home of his maternal grandmother, who was distinguished as a pietist. He spent much time in the study of the Bible, Luther's works and pietistic writings, and all of his predilections were strongly in the direction of personal Christian service. Especially was he an enthusiastic advocate of missions to the Jews and the heathen. The one thought of Zinzendorf, throughout all his life, was "heart religion," the central idea being a life of communion with God. To this idea he held at all times. He did not try to create a new church, but rather believed that his ideal might be realized within the existing churches. On the vital principles of Christianity he is generally regarded as having been sound throughout.

J. L. K., Waterford, Wis. World estimates of the numerical strength of the various religions are necessarily imperfect, owing to the difficulty, in a number of countries, of obtaining satisfactory data. According to a recognized authority, Gustav Sundbarg, the approximate strength of the different religions, at the opening of the current year, was as follows: Christianity, including all branches and denominations, 564,510,000; Buddhism, 138,031,000; Confucianism and Taoism, 300,830,000; Hinduism, 210,540,000; Mohammedanism, 221,825,000; Judaism, 13,052,846; Shintoism, 25,000,000; Animism, 158,270,000. Among the Christians, the Catholics are estimated to have 272,860,000 followers, the Eastern Churches 120,000,000, while the Protestant Churches, of all denominations, have 174,650,000.

Mrs. John H. Flower of Nolan, Alaska, who some time ago made an appeal for reading-matter for the miners in that far-away section, writes to the Christian Herald thanking its readers for their generous donations. She says, "It is impossible for me to acknowledge the letters I have received. I will put this reading matter which they have sent in Pioneer Hall, where every one can read it. If they wish to send any more papers here, they can send to Igloo No. 8, Pioneer Hall, Nolan, Alaska. All who have helped have our thanks and best wishes."

The Lost Bible

By W. E. Stephens, Director of the Brighton Beach Gospel Work

ON August 28-31, 1916, I was delivering at the Old John Street Noonday Prayer Meeting a series of addresses on the Second Coming of Christ. On Monday and Tuesday I took my Bible down town with me and laid it on my desk until noon-time, when I took it with me to the Old John Street Meeting. When I was through with the meeting on Tuesday I took it back to the office and laid it on my desk. It is a wide-margin Bagster Bible, containing comprehensive notes of many past years' experiences, and is therefore very greatly prized on account of its endeared associations. In the evening, when through with the work of the day, I left my office to mail my letters at Park Row. I went to the post office to post my letters. From there I went to the World Building, and from thence to the Brighton Beach elevated train at the Brooklyn Bridge, and got aboard the train with my newspaper, a package, and, as I thought, my Bible. When I got in and sat down, lo and behold! my Bible was gone. I looked around on my seat, on the floor and among my fellow passengers. But no Bible, no trace of it could be found.

The book was lost. I advertised the loss in the Herald and with intense desire and anxiety waited for its return. We prayed! and we prayed!! and prayed again!!! But no tidings of the Bible. Many persons asked me continually, "Stephens, have you got your Bible yet?" I said, "No, no tidings." I had been in the habit of reading one of the Psalms every morning and marking the date and hour of reading. Every morning when I would get up I missed my Bible to such a degree that I thought my heart would break. I felt keenly the absence of my notes and memoranda, which it seemed to me impossible to get along without. During this period of gloom and disappointment I derived some consolation from the fact that possibly the Lord had seen that I depended too much on my notes and memoranda and too little upon him. On Sunday, July 8, 1917, nearly one year after the loss, about three o'clock in the afternoon, when I was preparing to go down to Brighton Beach to preach the Gospel "out on the highways," the thought of my Bible came up to me because the subject which I expected to speak upon was copiously outlined in my Bible. I got on my knees in my room and prone upon the floor I lay, in devout, earnest and supplicating prayer to the Lord that he would send me back my Bible. The Lord gave me the answer in faith, and I knew that I should soon have it in hand. I was impressed with Heb. 11 : 1, "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." So I got up with all the hope and assurance that my Bible would surely come back, and went on to my work, with every doubt removed.

Wednesday, July 11, three days after this, a package came through the mail, which when I first saw it attracted my attention as to its size, and when I opened it, lo and behold! there was my Bible! It was found by a colored man, who threw it under his table, where it lay for nearly a year. On the same Sunday afternoon, and about the same hour, this colored man was impressed that he ought to send it back. His name, street and number can be given and other incidents connected therewith which I have not room here to mention. In relating this incident at the John Street Prayer Meeting, before giving the sequel I asked if any one was still praying for the return of my Bible, and one brother answered that he was, and upon inquiry he had been praying the same Sunday afternoon that I did. Thus he and I were praying at the same time, and the Lord impressed the finder at the same hour to send the Bible back, thus affirming the truth of Matt. 18 : 19: "Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven."

Why Stomach Distress is So Punctual and Regular

By JOHN ANTHONY BUTLER, A.B.

"WHY is it," one person will ask, "that I can expect my stomach gnawing and distress to come on regularly about an hour after every meal?" "Why is it," another will ask, "that I can look for the very same trouble about two hours after eating?" Thus, one case will have its trouble—sourness, fermentation, gas, heaviness—one hour after eating, while another case will have the same symptoms regularly two hours after meals. The notable thing is the common punctuality and regularity with which most stomach trouble comes. To understand the reason for this, it is necessary first to understand the basic cause of the trouble, which in 90% of the cases is stomach acidity.

We know that Nature provides hydrochloric acid as one of the digestive fluids. This acid is secreted by cells in the lining of the stomach. The lining of the stomach is extremely sensitive and in this respect it is very much like the lining of the nose. We all know that if we snuff pepper it will cause an irritation which will induce a secretion of mucous, a "running of the nose." Right here we have the cause of stomach acidity—irritation, which is brought about largely by wrong food combinations.

Some Foods Explode in Stomach

All foods are merely a combination of chemical elements. Thus, like other chemicals, many foods are harmless in themselves, but when combined with certain other foods, form gases and literally explode in the stomach. This chemical inharmony between certain foods causes too much hydrochloric acid. This excess of acid not only ferments the food and destroys its nutritive value, but it irritates and finally destroys the lining of the stomach.

When we take food into the stomach acid fermentation is temporarily relieved. This is because the excess acid attacks the food instead of preying upon the walls of the stomach; but the more food you eat, under these conditions, the more acid the stomach secretes—the more irritated the stomach becomes and the more difficult it is to cure.

The time the food remains in the stomach is determined by the amount of acid present. A great excess will hurry the food out in one hour; a small excess will empty the stomach in two hours. In each case the distress will come when the food has passed out and the clear acid is left to "eat" the delicate lining of the stomach. Thus, if your stomach trouble comes on regularly one hour after eating, while friend Brown's comes on two hours after eating, it shows that the excess of acid is greater in your case.

In time every one of the vital organs becomes affected—the heart, the liver, the kidneys, the intestines, the nerves and the brain, all decline in functional activity, because the blood is poisoned by the premature fermentation and consequent decomposition of your food.

Why Go On Suffering

Many people go on suffering from stomach trouble and constipation and the other resulting ills, "doping" themselves in vain, simply because they don't strike at the root of the trouble—wrong eating! All that is necessary to correct the basic cause in most cases, as Eugene Christian and his co-workers have shown, is to eat the proper combination of foods and avoid the harmful. Until recently, it is true, the average person had no easily available means of obtaining the proper knowledge of foods. Thousands could not possibly afford the trip to New York to visit Mr. Christian personally—among them, no doubt many who needed his advice most. So he set down in 24 little lessons the result of study, research and experience in directly treating over 13,000 cases, and founded the Corrective Eating Society for the purpose of distributing these lessons. It is now possible for every man and woman to have the help of the great food scientist in any part of the country and at any time—simply by referring to the lessons. Likewise, those who have no trouble should acquaint themselves with these wonderful little lessons so as to have a 100% stomach which means a 100% brain.

What to Eat for Health

The lessons are written in simple language and every point is explained so clearly that there is little chance for misunderstanding. Reasons are given for every recommendation, and every statement is based upon results secured in the author's many years' experience.

But the lessons do not merely tell you why you should eat correctly and what the results will be; they give actual menus for breakfast, luncheon, and dinner; covering conditions of health and sickness from infancy to old age and for all occupations, climates and seasons. They tell you what to eat if you wish to gain flesh and what if you wish to reduce, how to correct a multitude of bodily ills, and how to feed your children so that they may never know such ills.

A few of the chapter headings are as follows: How to Select, Combine, and Prepare Foods; How Wrong Eating Causes Sickness; What to Eat and What to Omit for all Stomach and Intestinal Disorders; Emaciation—Its Cause and Remedy; Obesity—Its Cause and Remedy; Nervousness—Its Cause and Remedy; Constipation—Its Cause and Remedy; Auto-Intoxication—Its Cause and Remedy; Digestive Harmonies—How the Business Man Should Eat; How to Measure Food Values—A New and Simple System; What to Eat for Nervousness, Low Vitality, Anaemia; What to Eat for Colds, Influenza, and La Grippe; etc., etc., menus being given in each instance.

If you would like to see the "24 Little Lessons in Corrective Eating," simply write the Corrective Eating Society, Inc., Department 3410, 443 Fourth Avenue, New York City, and they will mail you a set for examination. It is not necessary to enclose any money with your request. The lessons will be sent for five days' free examination with the understanding that at the end of that time you will either remit $3, the small fee asked, or return the lessons. You take no risk and if the more than 300 pages yield but one single suggestion that will bring greater health, you will get back many times the cost in personal benefit—yet hundreds write the Society that they find vital helpfulness on every page. Merely tear out and mail the attached form instead of writing a letter. It is a copy of the official blank adopted by the Society and will be honored at once.

Emergencies

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"I OFTEN wonder," I said, "what I would do in an emergency. I wonder whether I'd be brave, or a coward. I wonder——"

The smallest girl raised her eyes from the fleecy baby sweater that she was knitting. She was as white and soft and resistless as the wool that she was fast working into some sort of shape.

"I'm making this jacket for a little baby whose life I saved," she told me. "Emergencies, you say? Well, that was one. . . .

"His mother, who is a friend of mine, asked me to stay in the house once while she and her husband went to spend the night with her mother, who was desperately ill. She said that she would be back early in the morning, and it seemed very simple indeed. All I had to do was just to watch the baby every once in a while, to see that he was covered.

"I don't know anything about babies, but this baby had always been so good that I wasn't a bit worried. I took a book along and sat down in the next room and began to read. It was an interesting book, and I just about forgot the baby, until suddenly, around eleven o'clock, I heard a terrible gasping cough.

"I'd never seen a baby with the croup. And yet, instinctively, I knew that this baby had it, and was in danger. I had him out of bed in a moment, and as I held him in my arms ideas began to come into my mind.

"I don't know, yet, whether I had ever heard any women tell what should be done for a croupy baby. Perhaps, some time, I had read about the right course of treatment. I don't know. But something inside of me seemed to say 'hot water' and 'ipecac.'

"I got the baby into a hot bath. I put steamed cloths on his little throat. I fed him ipecac until the phlegm came. And then, at last, I saw him give a little sigh and close his eyes and go to sleep—naturally, like the tired baby he was. And as I laid him in his crib and turned away my knees got so weak that I could scarcely stand, and the tears ran down my cheeks."

The girl paused and bent over her knitting. She had dropped a stitch, and as she was lifting it carefully back on her needle I spoke.

"That was an emergency!" I exclaimed. "I wonder how you happened to remember the treatment?"

"I've always thought," answered the girl, again knitting swiftly ahead, "that God made me remember—in time."

LIFE is a series of emergencies. Some of the emergencies are so small and slight that we call them only incidents. Some of them are so great that we call them innovations. Some of them are so stirring that we call them catastrophes. Some of them pass unnoticed. Some of them shake our lives to the very deepest foundations.

I have heard of men on the battlefield, men who had been strong and brave and apparently fearless, who, at the first sound of firing, turned sick with blank, staring fear. I have heard of other men who, always before meek and abject and trampled upon, have risen from the chaos of war and turned a defeat into victory by sheer power of example and personality. Things like that are happening every day, almost, across the sea.

I have heard of firemen who have turned, at their first great fire, and run blindly away through a hissing throng, while some little office girl up fifteen stories in a blazing building has courage enough to say words of encouragement and comfort—words that catch the attention of a mob and turn it into an organized body that can fight and defeat a flaming death with coolness.

I KNEW a stenographer. She was a good stenographer, not because she had been at it long, but because she had managed to apply herself to her work—to do every small task well.

There was another girl in the office—also a good stenographer. And there was a big position open for one of them. Neither of them, however, knew of the opening.

The office manager watched the two girls. He wanted to give the best girl the big chance. But the girls were about equally good. And so he could not decide.

And then, one day, the emergency came. It came in the guise of a letter that needed an immediate answer. The two girls, unfortunately, were alone in the office.

"What shall we do?" said my friend.

"We'll have to let it go—" answered the other stenographer. "I think I know what to say—but I wouldn't take the responsibility."

My friend considered for a moment. "If this isn't answered now," she said, "we lose a large order. I, too, think I know what to say." And she pounded out an answer on her typewriter and gave it to the waiting messenger.

It happened that the answer was the right one. And the next day the office manager, smiling contentedly over a pleasant contract, called her to his desk.

"We've got a good job open," he said, "for a girl who knows what to do in an emergency."

"Well?" questioned my friend.

"It's yours!" said the office manager.

I SOMETIMES think that emergencies show the real value of the person. For emergencies are so spontaneously unexpected that one must usually answer them by the impulse that cannot be studied out at length. A savage instinct has often made an ultra-civilized person kill as an answer to an emergency. It has often turned a mouse of a woman into an amazon. It has often turned a prize fighter into a wan, limp being unable to control his perfectly responsive muscles; and it has often made a defiant, unemotional woman turn into a sobbing wraith of herself.

Life is made up of emergencies, and life, itself, is an emergency! And it's good to be able to think, with the girl who told me her story over the small knit sweater, that God puts the necessary material to meet life into our hearts and minds just as he made the leopard as dappled as the sunlight on his forest home, and the snake as neutral or vivid as the foliage he lives in.

For God does put words into our mouths, and thoughts into our minds, and strength into our hearts. But if we are going to meet emergencies successfully, we must not leave it all to the Great Unseen Power.

I once knew a little girl who did not like to study. But, because she knew that she must pass her school work, study she did, with a smoldering resentment.

And then one day in Sunday school she found the solution to her difficulties. For her teacher said, "If we ask God to help us he will. If we pray to him for assistance. . . ."

Before her next examination the little girl did not study. Instead of learning her lesson she knelt down and prayed to God, asking him to see that she passed her tests.

Of course she failed. She failed rather miserably. For she had left everything, quite lazily, in the hands of God without even attempting to do her part. If she had asked God to help her and had done her best to learn her lesson the prayer would have been worth something.

We must not be like a child who, unreasoning, prays to pass her examinations and then doesn't study. By neglecting to do our part we may fail in an emergency just as utterly as the little girl failed.

Store up useful knowledge and strength and helpfulness. If you do that you will also be building up a firm character—and will power. And you will find, when the time comes, that it's the reserve character and will-power that can make the average person rise up, supreme, to face any emergency.

UNUSUAL RENEWAL OFFERS

National Bible Picture Study

READERS of the Christian Herald remember well the two interesting and extremely helpful Bible Picture Study competitions we have conducted.

In the first Study $3,500.00 in cash rewards were distributed to the 419 successful participants.

In the second Study, for which the winners are now being determined, cash rewards of $5,628.00 will shortly be awarded to 1,000 participants.

A More Wonderful Picture Story Plan

Now comes the greatest, yet the simplest, the most interesting and therefore the most pleasingly informing Bible Study of them all—a National Bible Picture Study.

In this third Study there will be fewer pictures. We will furnish a book of about 2,000 Bible verses from which the answers are to be selected and also an Answer Book in which to write down the answers. These two books will constitute the outfit.

Reserve Your Outfit Now

A complete outfit will be given with a year's subscription to the Christian Herald, at 10 cents extra. Send in your renewal now and we will enroll your name in the National Bible Picture Study. An outfit with complete information will be sent to you just as soon as the books are ready to be distributed. IT IS ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY THAT YOU ASK FOR THIS OUTFIT WHEN SENDING YOUR SUBSCRIPTION $2.10

The Pictorial Life of Christ

Eighty Magnificent Sculptural Illustrations by the Famous Italian Master-Sculptor, DOMENICO MASTRIOANNI

THESE magnificent pictures are not paintings. They are something finer. The originals are combinations of sculpture and sculptural reliefs done in wax and clay and wonderfully grouped and photographed in such a way as to bring out in sharp contrast the lights and shadows and perspectives. The resulting photograph is something absolutely and entirely different in the history of art. There is a depth of space realized in looking at these pictures that you have never known in looking at a drawing or painting.

In simple, attractive language, the story of the life of Jesus is told by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd, who has adhered faithfully to the narrative in the Gospels. He is a lucid and sympathetic writer and gives a clear conception of the social, religious and political conditions in Galilee during the time Christ was upon earth. No expense has been spared in producing a book worthy in every respect of these wonderful pictures. The binding is an extremely handsome design in white vellum with red and blue letters. Size, 7 x 10 inches.

We will send The Pictorial Life of Christ, and the Christian Herald for one year, for only.... .... $2.25

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A FEW years ago a schooner, Boston bound, was caught off the coast of Maine by a terrible gale. It was a gale no seamanship could weather, for, though headed into the wind, she was driven leeward, and the tightly reefed sails were stripped from the yards, while monstrous seas tore at the ship and her deck load of lumber. The captain knew of a harbor, a safe harbor, but the entrance was narrow and hard to approach, even in good weather. There was no other choice, so he let the ship fall away until she gained headway, and then let her drive before the storm, steering his way toward the landlocked harbor and safety. Soon the pounding surf was heard off the starboard bow. The captain strained his eyes to see through the driving rain and the swirl of the sea. Then through the haze appeared a familiar headland. The wheel was thrown hard to port and swung quickly to starboard, and the keel went over the reef with only a touch on some unseen rock. Almost immediately the vessel entered into safety, for the headland halted the wind and the harbor felt only the ground swell of the sea. And we, when we are driven by the storms of life, when temptation assails or misfortune surrounds us, or sorrow bears us down before it, when we are tempest-tossed on the sea of life, there is a love-locked harbor where we can be at peace, and it is entered by the narrow door of prayer.

A Believer in Prayer acknowledges answered prayer in a gracious revival, in which many souls have been converted, and asks the prayers of God's people for a large circle of friends and relatives, especially one who is in sore need of divine help in body, mind and spirit.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Rives Junction, Mich.; Frost, W. Va.; Hamlin, W. Va.: A retiring minister, Jeannette, Pa., requests prayers that the right minister may be sent where he is leaving, and that he may be sent to the field of labor where God would have him go.

Mrs. B. B. S. asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; H. H. that mind of neighbor's son may be restored; H. L. W. that son-in-law may be released from the insane asylum; E. E. and J. M. ask prayer that mothers' minds may be restored; Mrs. F. C., that husband's mind may be restored; A Believer, that a dear one's mind may be restored; seven others ask prayer for mental restoration and strengthening for themselves or friends.

A reader asks prayer that sight may be restored; Rev. and Mrs. L. C. A., that a boy's sight may be restored; E. M. R., that a friend's sight may be restored.

Four friends ask prayer for the restoration of hearing.

Seven friends ask prayer for special blessings for others.

Seventeen friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. M. B. D. asks prayer that three sons may be cured of the liquor habit; A. S. P., that husband may be cured of the liquor habit; three, that friends may be cured of the liquor habit

Twenty-six friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

A subscriber asks prayer that a son-in-law may be cured of the drug habit.

Forty-one friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives.

Seven parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; eight wives, their husbands; nineteen, other relatives and friends.

Twenty-seven friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs.

E. P. M. asks prayer that son may be cured of the cigarette habit; M. B., that father may be cured of the tobacco habit.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

H., Athens, N. Y.; A Believer, Pendleton, S. C.; A. S. P., Johnson Creek, Wis.; Mrs. I. W., Watkins, N. Y.; Mrs. S. G., Des Moines, Iowa; E. C. M., Minneapolis, Minn.; Mrs. A. M. L., Cooperstown, N. Y.; J. F. W., Harlan, Iowa; Mrs. M. B. D., Pine City, Minn.

The Deadly Peril to Our Girls

By ADA WALLACE UNRUH

AMID the enthusiastic activity for Red Cross, Liberty Bonds, and War Relief of various character which is absorbing our thought and energies, in our efforts to do all possible and impossible for "Our Boys," there is danger that we may lose sight of the welfare of Our Girls, which is strangely menaced these days.

It is well for us to realize that if a stain is cast upon the potential motherhood of our land, if in any way our girls become less worthy to be the mothers of a clean, virile race, Columbia will have lost in this war, no matter what brilliant victory shall have come to us in the "far-flung battle-line."

Where is this menace and danger? "The lure of the uniform" has spread its net for the unwary feet of our untaught girls, and they are being swept from their moorings by the hundreds, aye, by the thousands; and the mother's boys, who should also be protected from these dangers, are being hurled into the vortex.

The camps of the guards are everywhere; the soldier in his artistic uniform is on every street. In traveling several hundred miles recently, scores of these camps came under my observation. Scarcely one was passed where groups of girls of high school age were not seen standing about at a greater or less distance, inviting attention or chatting on familiar terms with the men. Parents were, for the most part, apathetic or ignorant of the danger. Only a few serious-minded, experienced men and women were terrorized as they realized the inevitable aftermath.

THE older and Christian soldiers deprecate these things; others, less thoughtful, welcome the girls openly, but sneer behind their backs; while the greater number look upon their presence as a diversion to break the monotony of camp life with its hours of daily drill, its watching of bridges and tunnels.

The established posts and regular training-camps offer better protection while the men are on duty, but when on leave of absence girls are seen hanging on the arms of soldiers as they walk the street, chatting on corners, engaged in innocent (?) flirtations in ice-cream parlors, sitting on benches in the parks, making clandestine acquaintance with men and boys of whose antecedents they know absolutely nothing; and by the same token soldier boys are making acquaintance with girls of whose antecedents they are ignorant, under circumstances and conditions which would not be possible were they in civilian clothes.

Eliminate the sex problem, and it would be an innocent flirtation (if such are ever innocent); no harm done save "the bloom brushed off the grape" for the girl, a loss of reverence for womanhood for the young man; either of which makes the life immeasurably poorer.

But the sex problem can never be eliminated in our study of and dealing with the relations of young people. It is the essence of the situation. It becomes the most beautiful or the most awful problem, just as it is approached from the normal or from the perverted side. These are approaching it from the wrong side, and both will suffer, even though it be only in the loss of fineness of character.

THE familiarities we see indulged in between these acquaintances of a day are fraught with serious danger when the meeting has been through regular channels, and often result in irregular marriages, blighted lives and nameless children. But when easy acquaintance has let down the bars of respect the average young man feels at liberty to take advantage of every opportunity, and the risk becomes infinitely greater.

Remember that both the boy and girl are at the danger age—the years of stress and storm—with undeveloped judgment; that the girl is swayed by the glamour of that which bids fair to prove the "yellow peril" to many, the lure of the uniform; and the romance of war service is in her eyes.

To the boy, intoxicated by the adventure of a life whose next day lies in uncertainty, the dangerous opportunity comes, and ere either realizes it the Rubicon of a woman's peace and a man's honor has been crossed. Bad enough for the soldier boy, who should have been protected from such dangers; but a tragedy for the girl, who must bear a burden which involves the innocent life of a tiny baby who must carry the lifelong stain of illegitimacy.

This is no false alarm. Unless we awaken very soon the tragedy of South England and the war babies at the mobilization camps will be repeated in America. The danger is grave; the remedy must be swift and sure. Let fathers and mothers awake.

A Timely Book on Luther

"LUTHER EXAMINED AND RE-EXAMINED: A Review of Catholic Criticism and a Plea for Revaluation," by Professor W. H. T. Dau, professor in Concordia Theological Seminary, St. Louis, a book of 243 octavo pages, from the press of the Concordia Publishing House, St. Louis (1917), is the latest, and, in our opinion, one of the most valuable, studies of the life and labors of the great German Reformer. It is by no means a formal Life of Luther. We do not need another. It is rather a defense of the moral sanity of Luther's character and of the Scriptural basis of the movement of which he was, if not the first, the chief, human factor. It is a well-arranged series of definite and satisfactory answers to the interminable lies which have been uttered against Luther's character and teachings. In twenty-eight brief chapters Professor Dau concisely answers as many charges which have been brought against Luther's name and influence. Professor Dau is at his best in the fifteenth chapter, in which he makes plain that, in emphasizing the doctrine of justification by faith, far from perverting Scripture, Luther affirmed the article of faith by which the church of Christ in the world either stands or falls.

A thorough knowledge of the contents of Professor Dau's book might well be called "A short and easy method of answering Roman Catholic attacks on Luther and Protestantism." No serious charge has been brought against the great Reformer or against modern Protestantism, which owes its existence to his revolutionary work, which is not amply answered in this book.

Our City's Needs and How They Are Being Met

B. Y. P. U. Topic, John 4:29, 42.
(Congress Meeting)

WE like to cast our eyes far across the field. We strain to see what is on the horizon and overlook the things at our feet. Our enthusiasm for Missions increases with the distance which separates us from them. There is a certain romance about the faraway land where they dress as we do not and eat unheard-of things and worship hideous images. There is still a little romance for most of us in the work among mountain whites, and in the work of the home missionary in the Rockies and the desert plains of the West, but our own town is just our own town. It is too near for romance, possibly too well known for real understanding. Its evils we have become accustomed to; its good we take as a matter of course. Our next door neighbor who may be hungering for spiritual food is taken into our garden and shown our fine stands of corn or our golden pumpkins, or perhaps, on Sunday, when a pealing church-bell

THE SHIELD OF FRIENDSHIP

WHEN the newly-made acquaintance makes a statement we listen quietly — that's only fair.

As we meet this acquaintance again and again —as the acquaintance ripens into friendship—the statements made are not only heard but they are believed. We have learned to trust our friend; we have come to believe that what he says is intended to help and not to harm us.

The Christian Herald is this kind of a friend to its more than 300,000 subscribers. With most of them the friendship is of long standing. These friends rightfully trust us to protect them in all of their dealings through the Christian Herald—and we do.

Reputable American advertisers trust us, too. As they become familiar with our motives and standards they change from acquaintances to friends; they believe what we believe.

We want our subscribers and advertisers to know each other better, to become friends, to do business only on the straightforward basis of "make good or money back"—under the Shield of Friendship.

upbraids his conscience, he looks out and sees us pulling weeds in our old clothes, and sags back to his former callousness regarding the things of God. The girl or the young man fighting the hard fight for respectability and honesty is perhaps known to us as a member of a family of ne'er-do-wells, of whom little is to be expected, and instead of the helpfulness which should radiate from us to them there is coldness, aloofness and an atmosphere of expected failure. The saloon on our corner has always been there. We have grown accustomed to the maudlin wrecks of humanity which are its fruit, and the flaming anger that should burn within us against this enemy of our town is quenched by familiarity. We may even be electing year after year the same set of political hangers-on, producing city government which we all condemn when it is in power and all vote for when it pulls the necessary strings to get itself renominated. Within our gates there may be some foreigner (or some hundreds of them) anxious to learn English, or anxious to equip himself for American citizenship, and yet because we pass him every day and he is only a man in overalls, and grimy and greasy as well, we shrink from him instead of meeting his yearnings with the helpfulness which he deserves. We may be sending money to educate heathen children in the mission fields when, in our own town, poverty is being permitted to destroy potential leaders by sending to work children who should be at school. There is no better study for us than our own town if the study is made in sympathy and in the spirit of Christ.

Ministering to Christ

C. E. Topic. Matt. 25 : 31, 46. (Work for Prisoners, Strangers and the Sick.)

IF only we could write above the portals of each day the one word "inasmuch"! If only we could remember "the least of these"! But we are so busy, and our days are cluttered up with duties great and small. The needs of the home, the demands of business, the pressure of social and religious customs, use up our working hours and send us wearied to our waiting couch, and yet day after day we do nothing really worth while. We meet a stranger and we give his diffident hand a passing shake, and rush off to a gathering knot of church members planning the next social. Five minutes of real sociability tacked on to that handshake would be worth a solid week of the average sociable. We shudder at the steel gratings over a jail window, and are glad when we are past the somber-looking place; but how many of us have ever tried to carry a ray of sunshine into those dark and forbidding walls? Has it ever occurred to us that the men inside are men like ourselves, but men in deep trouble, men who need friends, men perhaps whom we might save from injustice, or whom, through the power of Christ, we might restore to respectable citizenship? Visiting the sick is of course, you say, the work of the minister and the flower mission; but only those who have had to lie in bed and listen to the life of the world surge about them, know how it gladdens the heart of the shut-in to see a familiar face, to have somebody to talk to about something besides aches, pains and pills. When you go to see the sick, take in all the pleasure you can. Do not ask them how they feel; but take them a breath from the out-of-doors.

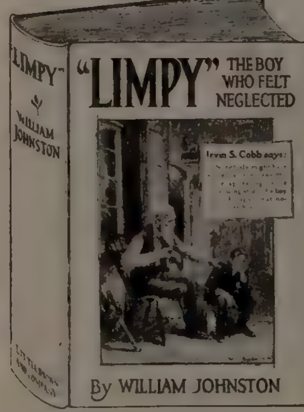
UNUSUAL RENEWAL OFFERS

"Limpy"—The Boy Who Felt Neglected



WHAT William Johnston has done in this story is to put on paper the soul of a boy of ten, who is just coming face to face with the truer values of life. No mean achievement is this, for it is a beautiful thing to look into the heart of a child and see what is hidden there.

This book has just been published and is making a big hit. A copy was sent to the secretary of the Christian Herald, and he became so interested in it that he sat up half the night reading it. If possible it interested him more than "Pollyanna." In his opinion, it is one of the most human stories that has been written in years.

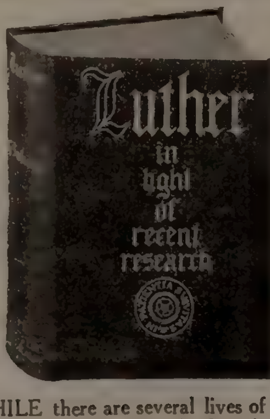
Irvin S. Cobb says: "Somebody might have written a truer, sweeter, more appealing, more convincing story of a boy than 'Limpy,' but nobody ever has."

Ella Wheeler Wilcox says: "'Limpy' is very beautiful and tender and ought to have a real success. It stirs the very best in its readers."

WE will send a copy of "Limpy" and the Christian Herald for one year (new or renewal) for............ $2.25

Luther Anniversary Book

Luther in Light of Recent Research



Luther in light of recent research

WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the approaching celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous Thesis on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation. The Christian Herald has had the good fortune to secure the exclusive American rights of this book and has had it translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

This great book is supplemented by eighty-one Luther pictures, all of them from the most authentic sources, and the whole forming a Luther Picture Gallery.

THE Life of Luther, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid for $2.50

FOR the winter? A closed car—by all means.

For the summer? An open car—most assuredly.

The Overland Model Eighty-five Four and Light Six Sedan and Coupe are both—closed and open cars.

And they are smart appearing cars either closed or open—in no sense make-shifts, either way.

The side windows—all of them—and the uprights that support them—fold away entirely out of sight when you want an open car.

The sides of the car above the body are entirely open from end to end whenever that is your humor.

And it's so little trouble that you'll shut the car up tight for even a light shower and have it all open again in a jiffy as soon as it's over.

Then there's the solid comfort all winter long of a perfectly enclosed car with all the protection of a limousine and the richness of closed car upholstery and interior finish.

Mounted on the economical Overland Model Eighty-five Four or Light Six chassis, these are ideal every-purpose cars.

And you'll be delighted with their luxuriousness.

The unusually comfortable seats of the Sedan are upholstered in a soft, rich gray, fine striped cloth. Sides and ceiling are lined to match, and a thick gray carpet covers the floor.

At the rear window there is a rich gray silk roll-up curtain. A dome light in the ceiling softly but amply lights the interior at night whenever desired.

Enjoy the full round of the seasons in luxurious comfort.

The entire output of these models is being quickly taken up by our dealers.

They knew it would probably be a long time before we could again build such luxurious cars to sell at such low prices.

Questions and Answers

M. J. S., Dubuque, Iowa. Is it not a strange thing to hear of a Bible famine? Strangest of all that it should have happened at a time when the world is in greater need of daily guidance and inspiration from God's Word than it has ever been in the past. How can it be true? I have been brought up in a Bible-loving home, where the old Book has always been regarded as indispensable to the morality and the material happiness of the race, and as standing alone as the revelation of the divine message to man. It is of such inestimable value that I think even the complete loss of all other books ever written would be trifling, in comparison with the loss of the Bible.

The daily newspapers have their own picturesque and vivid way of putting things. What they meant to convey by a "Bible famine" is that the supply is totally inaqeduate to meet the present demand. The need of Bibles by the hundred thousand, to be supplied to our new National Army, has put extraordinary pressure upon Bible production. This is a campaign of loyal Christian service, in which all readers of the Christian Herald can "do their bit" by sending in a gift to our Soldiers and Sailors Fund, which supplies both Bibles and Christian Heralds to the Nation's defenders.

Somewhere in France

By Margaret E. Sangster

JUST an empty fireplace,
Torn aside;
Just the heart-throb of a home
That has died.
Just the fabric of a dream
Swept away;
Just the echo of a lost
Yesterday.

Just the heart-throb of a home
That was bright;
Just the shadow of a dark,
Endless night.
Just a hearthstone that was once
Flaming gold;
Weary as one woman's soul—
And as cold.

Just an empty fireplace,
Touched by years;
Blackened with the sweep of guns,
Washed by tears.
Just a face with sorrow's brand
On its brow;
Just the heart-throb of a home—
Vanished—now!

A Boudot, formerly a missionary in Africa and now acting as interpreter with the French army in Europe, writes: "May I appeal to your exceeding great kindness to ask you if it would be possible for you to place me on your free list for 1917-1918? Your most interesting paper would be very useful—here at the front—where there are so many Tommies and Sammies, and where so much spiritual work could be done by means of good illustrated spiritual magazines. So I do hope you will be able to send me your timeliest Christian Herald, for which please accept my very best thanks, and believe me to be yours most heartily in the blessed hope of the very near coming of our dear Lord and Saviour." Interpreter Boudot's request has been granted, and he will receive the Christian Herald for use in his work among the soldiers. We trust that it may be as serviceable as he could wish.

Reader, Hines, Wis. The serial story, "The Road to Understanding," ended in the Christian Herald just as it was ended by the author, Mrs. Porter. We do not know whether she had in mind a sequel, in which Burke and Helen Denby should live "happily ever after." That is a question still locked up in Mrs. Porter's mind.

Carrie Judd Montgomery, Beulah Heights, Oakland, Calif., writes: "It has been very much laid upon my heart that God's people should ask the President of the United States to proclaim a National Day of fasting and prayer, that all the praying people of this land may be united in asking God to have mercy upon our nation at this critical time of sorrow and trouble. This thought came to me very forcibly one morning, and the same afternoon my husband opened the Christian Herald which is published in England and saw that a movement was on foot there to ask the prime minister to appoint a day of prayer for that nation. They had already secured many names to this petition. We can secure many names here in California, but knowing your interest in all such good movements, I am putting the matter before you. We shall be glad to co-operate with you in any way possible. We feel that this is a subject of the most vital importance at the present crisis of our nation's history, and so we trust you will give this matter your prompt attention."

G. A. L., Dixonville, Ore. The sin of the natural man is called original sin, as distinguished from actual sin. The Psalmist says: "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me" (Ps. 51 : 5). See also Rom. 5 : 12, and Eph. 2 : 3; "We were by nature the children of wrath."

Wm. D., Jamestown, Pa. Paying church dues, giving to the Sabbath school and missions, is certainly the right way to use tithe money. In addition, we should not forget to use a part for local and general charities and in doing good.

Interested Reader, Broddyville, Iowa. No one is qualified at this time to foretell the duration of the war, and speculation of the sort your letter mentions is therefore idle.

Subscriber, Vasville, S. C. The thirty pieces of silver for which Judas betrayed the Saviour, it is estimated, would equal about $20 of our money, a shekel being worth about 62 cents. Thirty shekels equaled 120 denarii, and a denarius was the price of a day's work. The present purchasing power of the money would be perhaps ten times its value in those ancient days.

Rev. Dr. Biederwolf, of the Commission on Evangelism, 402 Marquette Building, Chicago, writes to the Christian Herald concerning the evangelistic outlook. Ministers and ministerial associations inquiring through the commission for the services of an evangelist will be furnished with the information only of such men as bear the very highest commendation, and who observe the standard of principles announced by the commission. His letter says: "This especially should be a year of evangelistic work. Never was there a greater need, and never have hearts been better prepared for the message. Yet fewer evangelistic meetings will be held than for any one of the ten years just passed. It is true that the war has much to do with this fact: but to the careful student of the situation it is also apparent that not a little reaction has been setting in because of certain features of present-day evangelistic work with which the church cannot bring herself to sympathize." The commission asks that the credentials committees of churches send it reliable information concerning those evangelists with whom these committees come in contact, and especially as regards the financial obligations, social relations, education, pastoral experience, evangelistic efficiency, and average of conversions; also as to the thoroughness of their work, and whether it is marked by any unusual features, commendable or objectionable.

J. L. L., Salem, Va. Allow me to call attention, in a friendly way, to a statement in your issue of 5th inst., paragraph "The Boss Speller," page 935. "Taught" in the Greek of Acts 22 : 3 seems to refer to the previous "I" (Paul), in the same way as "born," "brought up," and "zealous," and not to his teacher.

H. A. B., Arlington, Wis. The Christian Herald of September 12 says: "Let's Drum Booze Out of Camp." We know of the booze practice during the war of 1861-1865, when Uncle Sam filled canteens instead of furnishing food, while many soldiers survived the war and were ever after habitual drunkards. An elder brother of the writer, who was in the Sherman march, said: "For three days during this time, our canteens were filled with whisky; no hardtack or food of any kind; while along the road lay many dead from sheer starvation and exhaustion." Distressingly cruel, to pour liquor into an army of men, poorly fed, and drain the last drop of blood unto death.

A. L. R., Goode, Va. I am glad to learn from the Christian Herald that the people want a day set apart for prayer. I have often wondered why the President did not set apart a day for prayer and fasting. We read in Matt. 17 : 20, 21: "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove. . . . Howbeit, this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting." Now, this war is certainly a mountain of horrors, and don't you believe that if the people would come to the Lord in the right spirit, he is ready to answer our prayers in his own way? In the Civil War the President set apart a day for fasting and prayer, and I don't think it was long until we had peace. I recollect the day well.

C. F., Richmond, Ind. 1. The expression, "wrath of of God," is variously used in Scripture. It means, in certain places, the anger of the Lord, kindled against his enemies, or by the persistence of sinners. In the farther sense, it refers to the judgment to be pronounced upon the unrepentant on the "last day," after other judgments have been permitted to fall upon them, sword, famine, pestilence, etc. 2. We have sent your other question to Dr. Gray.

A. C. D., Somerville, N. J. We think the answer to your letter may be found in the passage John 18 : 36. Had the teachings of Jesus been followed by those who claim to be Christians in all lands, we believe there would have been no war. This applies, of course, to pastors as well as laymen, for surely the church has its responsibilities.

Mrs. L. P., Glenwood Springs, Colo. Old newspapers and magazines will not be accepted or forwarded to our troops at the front, nor even to those in the home camps. This has been very clearly explained in the official announcements on the subject. Only copies of the current weeklies and fresh magazines will be accepted.

C. F. M., New Florence, Mo. The German Emperor is a member of the German state church, whose religion is a modified and amplified Lutheranism.

Miss N. P., Greer, S. C. 1. Paul's command to women to keep silence in the church referred specifically to the women of the particular church of which he was writing, and had no general application. 2. In Gen. 49 : 23 commentators hold that the archers denote the adversaries of Joseph, his brothers, as well as Potiphar and his wife: and the arrows shot at him were envy, revenge, temptation and ingratitude.

A. R., Petersburg, Ind. 1. One who has committed the unpardonable sin cannot be happy, because there cannot be any real happiness in a soul weighed down with the realization of having cut loose from the only anchor of life and happiness, and which is now drifting on the sea of unbelief and doubt. 2. There is only one way to forgiveness, and that is through the blood of Christ. (Eph. 1 : 7; Col. 1 : 14.)

Sunday School Class, Sullivan, Ill. 1. Prophecies concerning the present times are discussed by Dr. Gray in his articles now running in the Christian Herald. 2. Nahum 2 : 4 has been quoted as referring to automobiles, but this appears to strain the meaning of the passage, which was written as a direct prophecy of the destruction of Nineveh. The verse describes the mad rush of those in chariots to escape the enemy.

H. A., Olla, La. The marriage alluded to by Christ when he refers to himself as the bridegroom (Matt. 9 : 15) is allegorical as typifying the close relation existing between the church and its Head.

Winning the War With Corn

By FRANK MOORHEAD

And though ye gain but little thanks
That wield the spade and hoe;
Your hills of corn are stalwart ranks
That march against the foe!

SO sings the poet. Is there reason, other than the ever-present poetic license, to believe that the world war may, indeed, be won with corn? Let us look into the situation.

"Eat corn-meal and beat the submarines" may be merely an epigrammatic slogan; it may be the chief means to the destruction of militarism. At any rate, there is going on, just at present, a veritable "johnny-cake revival" which bids fair to release millions of bushels of wheat for the fighting men in Europe. The ante-bellum days of corn pones are in a fair way to be lived over again, while good old plebeian lye hominy may, in the end, prove as effective as shot and shrapnel.

The Department of Agriculture estimates the winter wheat crop at 417,300,000 bushels this year. The spring wheat estimate is 242,400,000 bushels—125,000,000 bushels more than last year, but only 19,000,000 more than the average for the past five years. Should these figures prove accurate, America is confronted with a wheat shortage this year of 150,000,000 bushels, using the five-year average for comparison. When we stop to consider that it takes about five bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour, here we are confronted with a shortage in wheat this year sufficient to make 30,000,000 barrels of flour. Moreover, when we go on to figure that a barrel of flour will make nearly 300 loaves of bread, as ordinarily baked for the trade, we have a bread shortage in prospect this year of 9,000,000,000 loaves, an average of 90 loaves to every man, woman and child in the United States. The prospect for bread for the fighting men of Europe—to say nothing of the stay-at-homes—is not very bright.

IT was when every possible effort was being made to reclaim and utilize the millions upon millions of acres of abandoned winter-wheat land in the Middle West that the johnny-cake revival sprang up. Robbed of its sectional suggestion and its romantic glamour, johnny-cake is nothing more or less than corn bread, an edible to which all too little of the nation's corn crop of former years has been devoted.

If the United States is to undertake to furnish 200,000,000 bushels of wheat to Europe this year—and that is much below the requirements from this country, even if Canada has a big crop—it is evident that the American people must curtail their consumption of wheat about 25 per cent., and this in the face of the fact that Nature has already cut down their allowance quite materially.

Corn is used now, for human food, only in the form of meal, hominy, starch, and prepared breakfast foods. Millers declare that not more than 15 or 20 per cent. of corn flour can be mixed with wheat flour for successful bread-making, as the corn does not contain the gluten that holds the gas bubbles which makes wheat dough rise and produce light bread. But corn bread, johnny-cake and corn pones, made of ground corn, are not only palatable but likewise nourishing, while plebeian mush-and-milk is saving the situation in many and many a middle-class home in these days of aviating prices. Such being the condition, the corn crop takes on unusual importance and significance this year.

NEVER was any crop grown in any country in any year equal in value to the 1916 corn crop of the United States. For the first time in the history of the nation the value of the corn crop passed the two-billion-dollar mark last year. The entire issuance of the first offering of Liberty Bonds could have been handled by the products of the American cornfields in 1916, with enough left over to pay the annual interest for four years. This year there are indications that the 1916 crop will be surpassed by from one-half billion to three-quarter billion bushels. Unless Nature wreaks her vengeance on the fertile corn fields by early frosts, there will be johnny-cake a-plenty for America this year.

With his corn crop last year worth over a half billion dollars more than the 1915 crop and almost a billion dollars more than the 1910 crop, the farmer of the corn belt set himself, in the spring of 1917, to raising a crop which should surpass all predecessors. He proposed to do this in two ways. First, by increasing his corn acreage. Second, by increasing his corn yield.

For all that corn was so immensely valuable last year, the yield per acre was 1½ bushels below the ten-year average and five bushels below the 1912 yield. Take the leading corn state of the nation, for example. The average yield last year was 36½ bushels in Iowa, which led the nation in corn production and value; yet there were hundreds of fields in that state which yielded from 80 to 100 bushels to the acre, while the Master Corn-Grower, an Iowa farmer, produced 141.6 bushels to the acre. His achievements are the result of scientific breeding and careful ear-to-row methods. He has developed a high-yielding strain and his success has been well achieved and is a result of a systematic plan.

After careful tests all corn was discarded as seed corn except the highest-yielding ears. Every year the choicest ears have been planted in a breeding-plot, which has measured as high as fourteen acres in one year; every year the product of each row is weighed separately, and only the very best by field test is retained for further planting. This he has found by experience to be the only method that will give any indication of the yielding capacity of an ear of corn; and this system has made him the country's champion corn-grower.

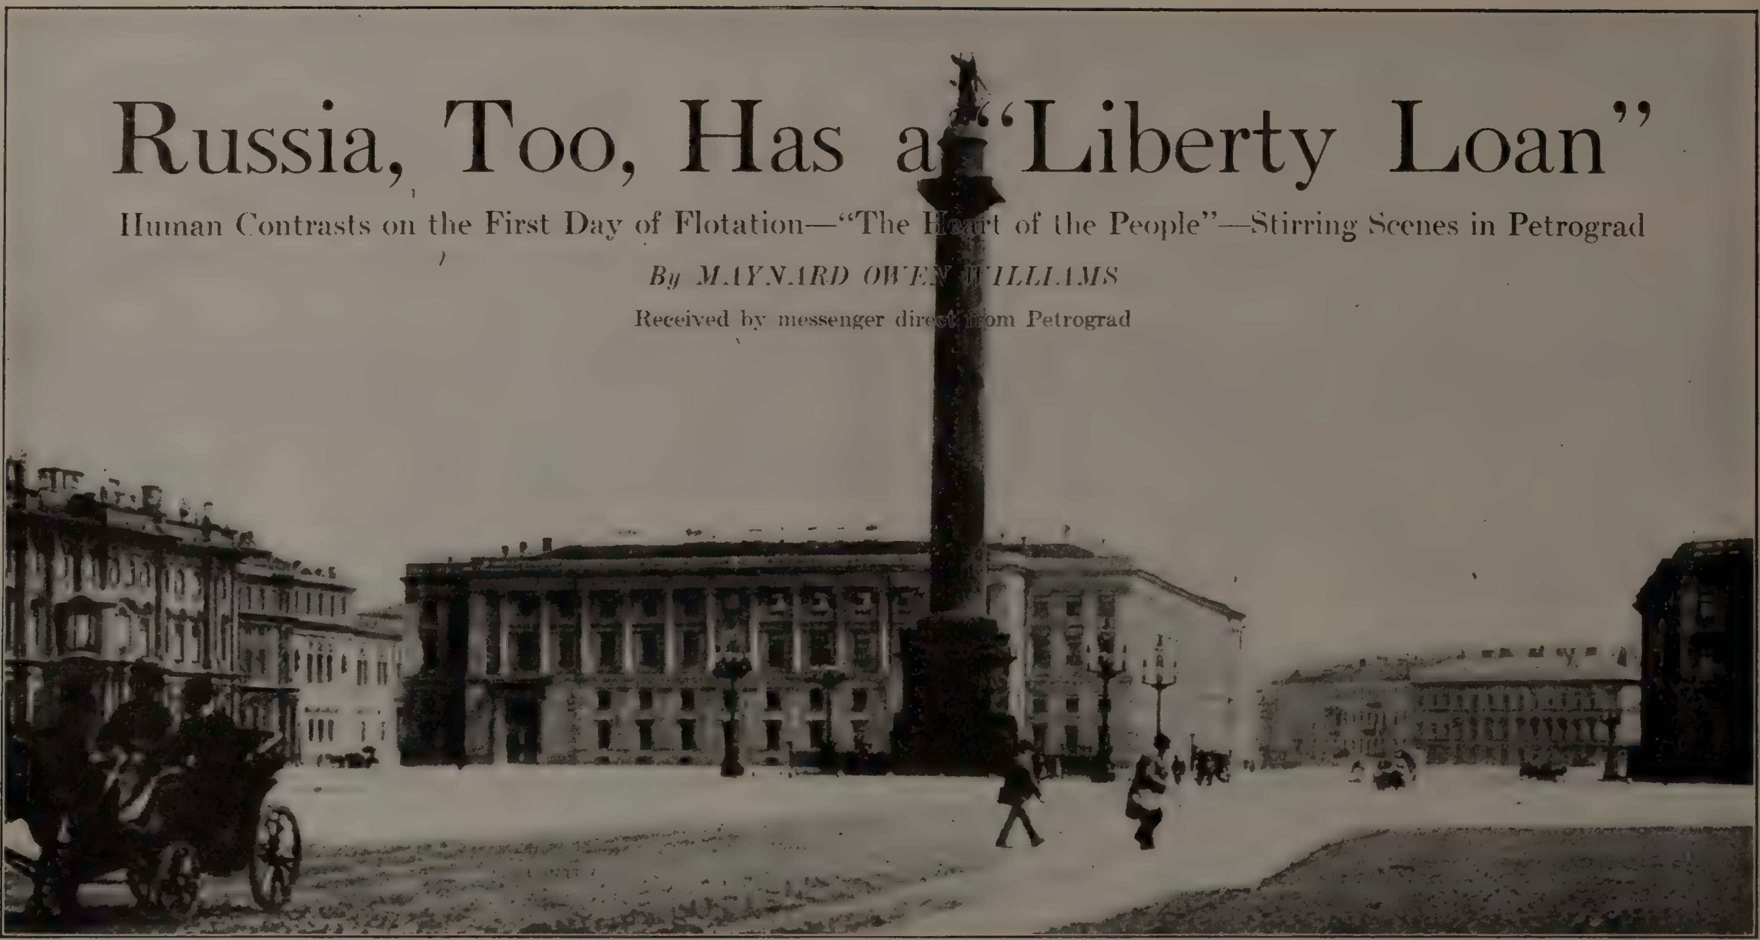
UNLESS frosts occur too early in October the corn belt will break all production records this year. But the crusade does not stop with this. The world's leading crop, given over in the past to feeding live stock, is to be diverted, in large quantity, to feeding human beings, so that the necessary quantity of wheat can be released for export. "Eat corn-meal and beat the submarines" reads one slogan. "Batter the Boches with johnny-cake" reads another. The embattled farmers of the American corn belt hope to make their slogans heard around the world, as was the shot fired by their progenitors at Lexington.

Russia, Too, Has a "Liberty Loan"

Human Contrasts on the First Day of Flotation—"The Heart of the People"—Stirring Scenes in Petrograd

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

Received by messenger direct from Petrograd



The Palace Square and Alexander Monument in Petrograd

"THESE stupid peasants and workers will have to learn through hunger. They have not only forced exorbitant wages and impossible hours from their employers, but many of them have stopped working altogether, and industry and transportation are disorganized. Oh, they'll know hunger all right, and it will be a good lesson to them. That is the only way you can teach such brutes."

When the speaker, who had just returned from a considerable tour in Russia, had finished his tirade, I made no protest. How could I? That was several weeks ago. I had not yet visited Russia. But if he were to say those thoughtless words today, I would ask him where his Christianity, or if not that, his humanity, had gone, that he should exult in the sufferings of his fellow men.

At that time I had not seen the great barges of wood on the Neva and in the canals of Petrograd, with men sweating under the August sun in order that others might not freeze to death in the long cold winter, when white nights will give place to dark days, and the gilded dome of St. Isaac's, now almost constantly bathed in a warm glow, will reflect the steely rays of a low-lying sun that fails to warm even at midday.

I did not realize then that the poor of Petrograd, driven by the marrow-piercing chill of winter, may be forced to burn the street paving in their fight against the numbing cold. I had not seen the long, brave bread-lines of Petrograd then, nor had I heard the soul-stirring song of the marching troops on their way to war, with its thunderous basses and its slow, tremendous rhythm.

I had not witnessed the generous charity which showers the lame and blind with ruble notes, and stuffs the many-colored collection-boxes in the churches with wads of bills. I had not caught glimpses of mourning women, kneeling in silent prayer before the crucified Christ or the Madonna. In short, I had not visualized these "brutes" of whom he spoke.

But yesterday, for six wonderful hours, I looked into the very heart of Russia, and I ask you, as Christians and lovers of humanity, to pray for Russia before you read another line. You should do nothing less. You can do nothing more.

WHEN the glittering needle of the Admiralty spire typifies to suffering Petrograd the cruel bite of winter cold, attacking underfed women and children; when the early ice on the Neva prevents the fuel barges from bringing their precious cargoes to a shivering city; when snow has blocked the railways, which are already undermanned and inadequate, charity will be too late. Even now, certain staple foods can not be obtained. Your dollars cannot help brave Russia then. So pray for Russia now!

I do not yet know the amount that has been raised for Russia's Liberty Loan during these three days in Petrograd, and I do not care, for its significance is measured in heart-beats and not in gold. There is no "story" in naming amounts to the people of a country that subscribes billions in a day.

But if I could tell you the story of that small Liberty Loan in terms of humanity, it would be such a story as Lincoln told in his Gettysburg Address—the story of humanity flooding the world with goodness.

At the central bureau of the loan I sought permission to ride in one of the big motor trucks which were used in distributing the bonds. The secretary asked, "Do you want to ride in one of the better cars along the Nevsky, or go out into the suburbs, among the workers?"

I considered for a moment. Although I realized that today the workers are the real rulers of Russia, just as they are the strength and power of every nation, it was almost by chance that I chose to go among the poor. It was a drama of six stirring hours, shot through with glints of humor and pathos. Sudermann's "The Weavers" resembles it as nearly as stage drama can approximate the reality.

FOR two days the Liberty Loan had beat upon my consciousness. Lovely women, with tactful grace and persistence, had pleaded with me to invest. Throughout the city there were delicate little booths in lavender, pink and white, more like charity bazaar pavilions for the sale of grape-juice or needlework, or as shelters from which rosy-cheeked matrons would sprinkle the crowds with samples of perfume, than counters over which patriotic citizens would furnish a socialistic government with the sinews of war for humanity while their armies were in full retreat.

Everywhere were striking posters proclaiming the event. A masterpiece in red, white and blue bore a gigantic "3" announcing the three-day loan. Two human-interest posters bore pictures of Russia's fighting men, standing out from a background of blood-red banners, which blazed forth the legend, "Liberty Loan."

Great auto trucks dashed madly through the streets, showering literature on eager throngs. Here and there orators addressed curious crowds. Women in spotless white, and wearing great sweeping picture hats, reinforced arguments with irresistible appeal. I have never seen a campaign so organized and advertised. It would have been impossible for many out of Petrograd's war-swollen population to remain ignorant of the fact that republican Russia was calling upon its citizens for aid.

We set out soon after noon, in a truck laden with literature, boy scouts to distribute it, two soldiers, two cashiers to make change, and an alert little woman who received the money from eager hands and passed out bonds to those who had sacrificed to obtain them. On our way to the suburbs we stopped to pick up our orator—a large, black-bearded man with a leonine head and a face that recalled some pictures of Christ. It is remarkable how many men in Russia look like the pictures which non-Russians have painted of the Master.

WE passed the great, silent bread-market with its barred doors, and lumbered over awful pavements, past an idle ammunition factory, to the humble homes of the workers, who were enjoying a church holiday. There was not the show of fashion and gayety which distinguishes the Nevsky from four in the afternoon until night falls at half-past ten. Now and then a happy girl, hanging on the arm of her soldier companion, would pass through the drab crowd, touching it with a dash of green or tan or blue. A religious procession with flying banners like lambent flames, and with barbaric robes heavy with gold and silver embroidery, passed silently by, adding their note of contrast as they went. Two sisters erect and trim-looking in their white flannel skirts, white diaphanous waists, and white tennis hats, passed by on their way to a fruit-stand, where they bought apples at half a ruble each, and tomatoes at four rubles a dozen. But for the most part it was a group of slouchy hats, greasy coat-fronts, faded shawls with gay borders, bright youngsters stretching eager hands for literature they could not read, and tremendously human faces.

Patiently they listened to the speech of the orator, calm, and without bombast, an appeal to the heart. There was no such ostentation as sometimes distinguishes the money dealings of a rich man. These people, who had known three months of better wages, due to a change in government, were proving the sincerity of their socialism by dividing generously with the government that had thus blessed them. They were not buying protection, but supporting a cause.

Not once did the speakers represent the bonds as a profitable investment. Not once did the people seem to regard it as such. It was almost a gift. I saw dozens of buyers who neither counted their bonds nor their change. Yet bread in Petrograd is scarce and dear, and laboring folk, when hungry, realize the value of money.

THE first buyer, a woman in a dull brown shawl and a clean but shapeless dress, thrust up a roll of bills amounting to two hundred rubles, and received back twenty-six rubles and thirty-three kopecks. The bonds, with the ruble at less than half its former value, are selling at a trifle more than eighty-five rubles a hundred. It was evident that the money returned came to her as a surprise. There were scores of others who eagerly thrust forth their money, but were plainly confused when they got back the difference between the nominal value and the selling rate.

The secretary had told me how the banks and insurance companies, representing Capitalism to dull minds, had hesitated to send lone trucks, laden with thousands of dollars' worth of bonds, among mobs of workers, but how the workers themselves had pleaded for a chance to subscribe to the Liberty Loan. And here we were among people who gave freely but received their change with a shadow of doubt and disappointment on their faces. They had sought to aid their fatherland, not to receive discounts.

While the orator was speaking, a man on the outskirts of the crowd started a clamor for literature. Evidently he could not hear. But a small, fiery-eyed woman, with one visible tooth, soon silenced him. One of the boy scouts, however, threw out a bundle of fliers, which were rescued by a lad of twelve and distributed with even-handed justice.

Then the money began to arrive in streams.

Hundred-ruble bills were kept waiting for a wad of crumpled half-ruble notes which had the preference under the democratic rule of "first come, first serve." One man, without a collar and manifestly poor, refused a five-pound note, amounting to one-third the price of a car-fare, and went off to haggle with the fruit-vender.

ALL through the crowd there was being proved the efficacy of the sales method which has as its slogan, "Ask the man who owns one." One bond was inspected by a curious circle, and immediately money sprang from pockets and flashed in the air.

A woman came up, dragging a reluctant husband, and forced him to disgorge his meager funds. He received the shiny new bond with a stunned look and passed it over, with the change, to his wife. The couple stood there for a long time while the tears of confusion and doubt faded from his honest face and the triumphant smile of the woman was reflected by his own. Right there that slow-witted peasant had learned the joy of the giver, and as he left he smiled back confidently at the little woman who had sold him his bond.

I wondered whether a premonition of impending hunger and cold had dimmed those eyes, or whether some memory of a son killed on the field of battle had caused the pair to forget their necessary thrift in patriotic support. If you seek tragedy, you must look for it in the eyes of those who know responsibility, or those who love.

Think what it means! Throughout Petrograd thousands of working people are eagerly subscribing to a government whose stability and very existence depend upon popular sanity, moderation and patriotism. To repudiate national responsibilities now will be to rob themselves. Yet I trust it will not be the fear of loss but the sense of partnership that will make this bond issue a stabilizing force in Russia.

Up comes a woman with her money hid under her shawl. Every one of us knew it was there, even before she asked one last question and then shoved it into the hands of the little heroine of our group, who looked up with happiness glorifying her tired face and said, "Regardez, Monsieur, le peuple a un cœur." In one sentence she told the whole story.

IF I say it nowhere else, let me say it now. The Russian people, there among the smudgy factories and the humble homes, have a heart. You must realize that in order to understand. That is the fact that to my mind removes the Liberty Loan from the realm of commerce to the realm of humanity—that glorifies these humble folk who have never known glory "The people have a heart."

But let us consider for a moment the conditions under which people whose money represents toil on the one hand and necessities on the other are giving generously to a government which is all too lacking in stability. Russia's armies are in retreat. The loan was postponed from a time three weeks earlier because a party plot, masquerading under guise of a counter-revolution, riddled many a building with bullets and spilled Russian blood in the streets of the capital.

A week ago Russia had no government, but was running on momentum alone. Today Kerensky heads a cabinet which merits every atom of support. It is no time for experiments when a famished foe is not only threatening to sweep across the Bessarabian grain-fields, but is actually advancing toward the capital on the Neva. On the train that brought me to Petrograd the passengers paid hundreds of rubles to a group of inspectors whose only authority was forged arm-bands. During the six hours that I watched those poor people buy bonds, I did not see one coin of gold, silver or copper. The subsidiary coinage is in the form of postage stamps, printed on heavy paper and without glue.

RUSSIA is in a state of indecision and uncertainty, such as proved so irksome to America before the declaration of war; such indecision as the Filipinos chafed under for eighteen years, before they secured a promise of something definite. Such uncertainty paralyzes the mind, destroys confidence, and causes bourses and banks to tremble. Yet it is under just such conditions that these working people are capitalizing comradeship through patriotic support of a government which is their government, but which may collapse tomorrow. Commerce and self-interest cannot explain such a thing. "The people have a heart."

These simple folk are our allies in arms. Even as I write, high up here above Znamenskaya Square, with its elephantine equestrian statue of a Falstaffian Alexander the Third, a great mass of singing soldiers are entering the narrow doorway of the Nicholas Station. For some of them, at least, that doorway leads to death. A dozen nations are now allied in a war for humanity, but only one of them is now fighting humanity's battles within its borders. Russia alone faces destruction both from within and from without.

If the present government, which has enemies, falls, the dilemma of dictatorship or disaster will come at a time when the armies of the Central Powers are sweeping toward the capital. Russia may then be forced to make a separate peace—the most hateful thing the Russian peasant, soldier and workman, fears. And separate peace, while it may not affect the outcome of the war, must inevitably affect its duration and degree of destruction. [This letter was written late in August when the Russians were falling back before Riga and the German advance had not halted.]

Do you wonder I thrilled when the tired little woman with a beatific smile of comprehension said, "The people have a heart"? For if these people lose heart, the flower of American manhood must sacrifice that many more lives. These hard-earned rubles, thus given, may instil such stability in Russia that they will actually conserve American blood.

IN six hours I saw something more than two hundred workers surrender more than thirty thousand rubles in return for bonds which many of them do not understand. That means just so much less fuel and food. Under these conditions, even that pitifully small amount unquestionably represents Russian lives, sacrificed for a government that fights shoulder to shoulder with ours in the hope that humanity may have its right.

I don't ask you to send money to these brave people. They are proud of their independence. But I ask you, sincerely and honestly, as the greatest request I can make of you, to "pray for Russia."

A bearded peasant, passing the tiny chapel on the corner, has stopped for a moment to bow and cross himself. A sturdy driver, in his wadded coat and battered hat, walks off stuffing his twenty-ruble bond carelessly into his pocket. A bright-eyed baby repreatedly throws away his bonnet, chuckling at his mischief, while the mother offers her money to the state. A wounded woman soldier, buxom and ruddy of cheek, with no sign on her face of the horrors she has seen in the trenches, buys her bond with a glad smile. A boy hands up two hundred rubles and a bent little woman a thousand, while a funny old character with roving eyes, who has shouted, "Down with the proletariat!" seems rebuffed because they cannot accept his one-ruble note. Back in the crowd, leaning lazily against the window sill, stand a row of idle men, with drooping cigarettes accentuating drooping mouth-corners. An old woman grasps the arm of a man with a lighted match in order to get a light for her cigarette.

Have I idealized these people? Has my enthusiasm made me misrepresent? Have I reiterated the note of humanity until it bores you? That note was reflected from every one of those homely human faces. Are these Russians supermen, or are they just such human beings as you and I, with our ideals and our shortcomings, our good impulses and our failures?

WE rumbled back to the center of the city, past a bigger truck, more gaily decorated and filled with charming women and some Camp Fire Girls of sixteen, fair of face and bright of eye. We rolled down the Nevsky and saw small groups buying bonds at the dainty kiosks. On one corner a band started a national air and a few civilians removed their hats. Visions of womanly charm were appealing to the well-dressed crowds of Petrograd's proudest parade.

But the twelve-year-old boy scout who had interpreted for me gave expression to my feeling when he leaned forward and said in French, "Here there is not such enthusiasm as there was back there among the workers." There were as many bonds, but there was not the bond. We had both looked into the faces of the toilers and had seen humanity there.

A Week in the World's News

Relief for the Hungry. By authority of the act of Congress, approved the 10th of August, known as the Food Control Bill, President Wilson on October 10 issued a proclamation providing for the regulation under a license system of all commerce in twenty articles of food, with the special object of preventing hoarding or extortion. The proclamation covers all persons, firms, corporations or associations engaged in operating cold storage plants, elevators, warehouses, or in importing, manufacturing or distributing any of the controlled commodities except those already licensed, common carriers, retailers whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 per annum, farmers, gardeners or cooperative associations of farmers and gardeners; fishermen, members of exchanges; small millers, canners, packers of meats, and operators of poultry- or egg-packing plants; manufacturers of maple syrup, sugar and maple compounds, small dealers in cottonseed products; all others must secure licenses to carry on business in these commodities after November 1, 1917.

To Challenge the U-Boat. Secretary Daniels on October 9 awarded contracts for the construction of torpedo-boat destroyers, which will cost altogether $350,000,000. The Secretary announced that on that date there were under construction, for the American Navy, 787 vessels of all types, involving a total cost of $1,150,400,000.

The Shipping Board, it was announced on October 8, expected to add considerable to available merchant tonnage by taking over neutral ships held in American harbors by the Embargo Act, either by operating them under an agreement with the owners or by commandeering, the tonnage being about 400,000. Tank steamers in process of construction are to be rushed to completion in order to provide fifty more carriers for fuel oil, shortage of which is said to be keeping some British naval vessels from active service.

McAdoo Issues Warning. Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo was quoted on October 12 as declaring that the failure of the United States to subscribe for the Liberty Bonds would be a worse defeat than the loss of half a dozen battles on the field of France. The Treasury Department announced on the same day that at the end of eleven days' sale the total of subscriptions reported to eleven of the twelve Federal Reserve Banks was only $325,465,000, less than seven per cent. of the $5,000,000,000 which the Secretary of the Treasury had hoped to have subscribed by October 27. President Wilson on October 14 by proclamation called upon the people of the nation to assemble on the afternoon of the 24th of October to "pledge to one another and to the government that represents them the fullest measure of financial support." On October 15 it was reported that the total subscriptions were in the neighborhood of $650,000,000. The order went out to every Liberty Loan Committee to go "full speed ahead." The rallying cry is 10,000,000 Liberty Bond Buyers!

The Record Congress. The special war session of the Sixty-fifth Congress adjourned on October 6 after a session of 188 days. Congress heard the President on April 2, and at once passed a resolution recognizing a state of war with Germany. Within six weeks it had passed the selective draft act and had authorized increases in the army and navy and marine establishments. Within a month after the declaration of war it authorized the seizure of enemy vessels in American ports, and a month later passed the Espionage Bill giving the President authority over all ships and control over exports. This Congress authorized the greatest bond issue in our history, and made appropriations totaling $21,390,730,140. It adopted a revenue bill designed to raise $2,500,000,000, and authorized loans to Allied governments of $7,000,000,000; passed a Food Control Bill, and a bill providing for the insurance of soldiers and sailors, and authorized the construction of a great merchant marine and a great fleet of aircraft, all with practically no exhibition of partisanship and with no more discussion than was necessary to guard against errors and injustices. On the last day of the session, Senator La Follette was heard in his own defense against the charge of making unpatriotic statements, which had been referred to a committee. His address did not take up specifically the charges against himself, but was given over to a statement of his personal position. He declared his disapproval of the clothing of the President with the broad powers which he had asked and received in Congress, and pleaded for the rights of the people to have a greater voice in the decisions of war and peace. He declared also that Congress should exert its constitutional power to define and declare the objects of this war, which will afford the basis of a conference and for the establishment of permanent peace. He closed with the declaration of his belief that the way to paralyze the German arm and to weaken the German military forces is to state our objects in this war by a declaration that we are not seeking to dictate a form of government, or render more secure England's domination of the seas. Senator Kellog and Senator Robinson both spoke in answer to La Follette just before the adjournment of the Senate. Senator Robinson declared that "the whole speech of the Senator from Wisconsin is based upon the erroneous assumption that the United States declared war against Germany and forced war on her. We did no such thing. The United States recognized the state of war which had been existing between the United States and Germany for many months, and that state of war had been brought about by the brutal, lawless disregard by the German government of the rights of American citizens, and of the sovereignty of this great nation."

Revolt at Columbia. The trustees of Columbia University dismissed Professor James McKeen Cattell, of the department of psychology, and Professor Henry W. L. Dana, of the department of English and comparative literature, because of their pacifist tendencies. In protest, Dr. Charles Austin Beard, professor of political science at Columbia, resigned on October 8. These three professors are of international fame and standing in their departments. The aim of the trustees is said to be restriction of free speech in the university. Professor Beard is not a pacifist and is not in sympathy with the views of Professor Cattell and Dana. In his letter of resignation he charges that Columbia "is really under the control of a small and active group of trustees, who have no standing in the world of education, who are reactionary and visionless in politics, narrow and medieval in religion." Professor Beard continued, "We are in the midst of a great war, and we stand on the threshold of an era which will call for all the emancipated thinking that America can command."

Fragments of News. Charges made by Representative J. Thomas Heflin of Alabama, who said he could name thirteen or fourteen members of Congress who acted suspiciously about the time that Bernstorff's $50,000 was supposed to have been spent, were investigated by a committee of the House which reported on the last day of the session that Mr. Heflin had been unable to furnish any information that pointed to either corruption or disloyalty by any member. . . . Senator Penrose has announced that in the next session of Congress he will initiate legislation for the repeal of the zone tax on advertising and newspapers and for an investigation by the Post Office Committee through which a bill might be developed that would deal justly with newspapers and magazines. . . . The first Liberty motor truck was assembled at Lima, Ohio, on October 8. Opsonism, or Right Living

By W. H. VAIL

IN speaking of right living, of course, we refer always to the physical side of our being; yet the old Romans were right when they formed the proverb "Mens sana in corpore sano," meaning that the sound mind can only reside in the sound body. In other words, if one is to possess a sound and efficient mind, he must observe the rules of living that are in accordance with the laws of our creation. Could we have a stronger argument for learning what is involved in right living?

There are four wonderful words with which we should become familiar; and we should understand, as far as possible, their functions in connection with the animal economy, in order to make any progress toward knowing what right living really is. These words are Eugenics, Auto-intoxication, Metabolism and Opsonism.

Eugenics means well-born, and is the science of generative and procreative development. It is the doctrine of progress, or evolution, especially as it refers to the human race, through improved conditions in the relation of the sexes. Public attention has been called to this subject of eugenics very prominently, for a number of years, through the press, the schools and the platform. In fact it has been so fully discussed that there is no need that we should consider it further here, only to mention it in connection with the other words, for these four words should always be associated in one's mind, if we are to make any progress along the road of right living; and we must not try to sever them, or forget their intimate relationship.

AUTO-INTOXICATION means a poisoning with substances produced within the body, almost without exception during the processes of digestion and assimilation, or by the waste products of metabolism. The term auto-intoxication is more and more supplanting the term indigestion, (acute or chronic). You can hardly open a paper without reading of some person who has suffered from or died of acute or chronic indigestion. This is the same thing as saying that they died from auto-intoxication, for the poisoning always occurs in connection with the processes of digestion and assimilation.

Let us recall the fact that indigestion is caused through one of the three following courses of faulty action on our part: we have either eaten something that was not suitable to enter the stomach, or eaten too much in quantity of suitable food, or, lastly, we have eaten too fast, thus preventing the proper mastication of the food in the mouth before being swallowed. Therefore we see that auto-intoxication may be readily avoided, and can never occur to those who observe the rules of right living.

THE third word, "Metabolism," means passing over. We have the same term in poetry when we change from one meter to another. Again we have it in entomology, when we consider the changing or transition from the larva to the pupa. Related to the human race it is the sum of the chemical changes within any single cell of the body, by which the protoplasm is either renewed in the processes of life, or changed to perform certain special functions; or else is disorganized, and thus prepared for excretion. Thus the formation of colorless corpuscles for the blood, the elaboration of digestive ferments, and the breaking up of proteids into urea and other products, are examples of metabolism. As the law of gravitation is universal in its application in the realm of nature, so the law of metabolism presides over the fortunes and the functions of every particle of the food we eat, from the moment it enters within the portals of our mouths

Luther, Zwingli and Calvin

By O. H. PANNKOKE, Executive Secretary of the New York Quadricentenary Committee

THE celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the posting of the ninety-five theses has been distinctively a Luther celebration. There is no need to apologize for recognizing Luther's work. Dr. Schaff many years ago rightly said: "Luther belongs to all the world, and his position in history is secure."

No great change in history, however, is the result of one man's initiative, be he ever so exceptional in his insight, genius and courage. Many prepare the way for the change. Many cluster about the great leader in the midst of the fight when the great change comes.

It has been thus in the Reformation. The mention of Luther's name immediately calls forth the name of Melanchthon, his faithful helper and friend to his death, whose great service and ability Luther was ever first to recognize.

For a century before the Reformation the world had been astir with impatience seeking for change from conditions that were becoming intolerable. Professor Shepard characteristically says the world seemed to be going wearily in a circle looking for a break in the hard-and-fast logic and organization of medievalism through which it might step out into freedom and progress. It was doomed again and again to failure.

Well known is the story of John Huss in Bohemia, who rose against the lassitude and indulgence of the clerics, the worldliness of the papacy, only to meet an untimely death at the stake during the Council of Constance. Similarly the burning zeal for righteousness, civic and religious, of Savonarola won him only bitter hatred, opposition, and finally death

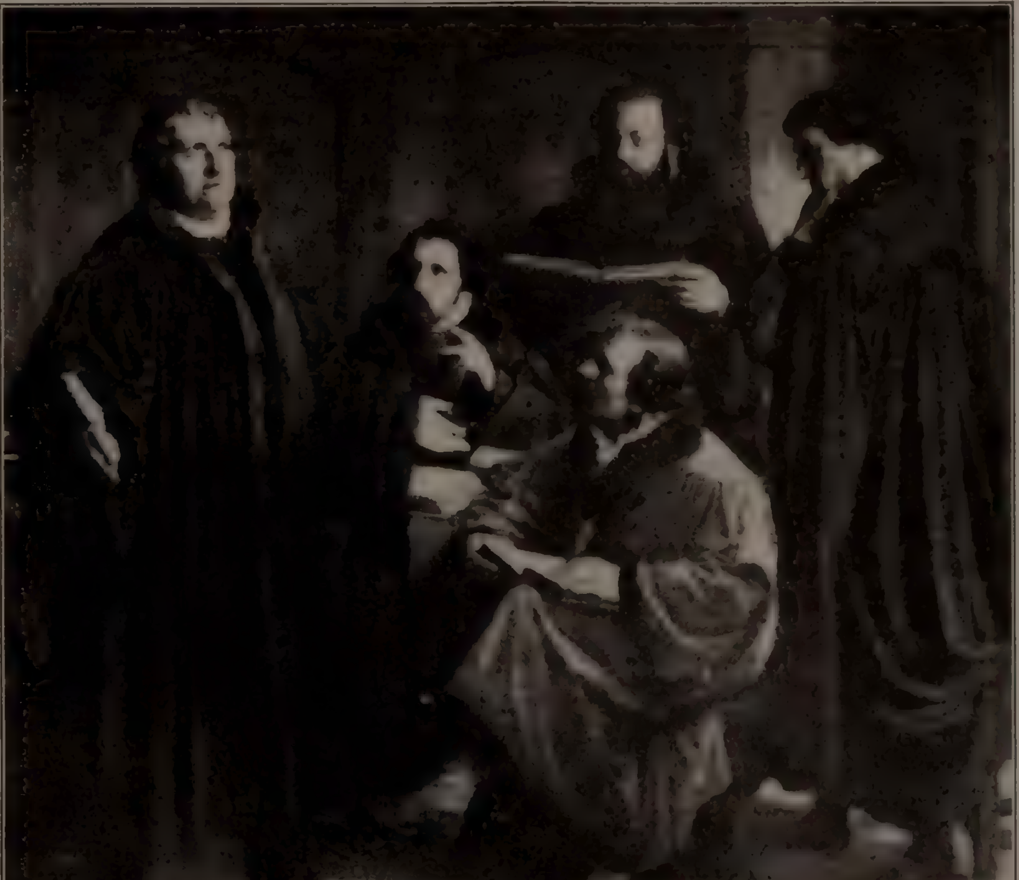
LESS dramatic but far more significant is the deep feeling of unrest among every class and condition of men throughout the extent of medieval Christianity. For seventy-five years before the great and bloody Peasant War of 1525 there are sporadic peasant risings, while complaints are continuous and dissatisfaction general. Many of the larger cities are torn by internal dissension and strife between the merchants and artizans on the one hand and the clerics on the other. Under the influence of the revival of learning the keenest intellects of Europe are turning against the narrowness, formalism, and superstitious, cruel bigotry of the church, opening upon her the floodgates of irony and sarcasm, until all Europe was laughing at the petty foibles and ponderous bathos of the churchmen. The chorus of protest is carried along by the ever-increasing notes of complaint uttered by the diets of the empire in the Grievances of the Holy Roman Empire. They lack popular appeal, they lack fire. But they gain in solemnity and weight, because they are measured, well-weighed decisions of a nation outraged beyond the point of bearing wrongs any longer in silence.

Luther's entrance upon this scene was dramatic; dramatic in action, far more dramatic in immediate results. It spread over Europe like a hurricane, fanning into flame the smoldering fires of discontent. Alexander, the papal nuncio at the Diet of Worms, 1521, writes back to the Pope, "Nine-tenths is for Luther and one-tenth is against the Pope." Luther's pamphlets were carried in the bales of merchantmen along the highways of commerce to every part of Europe. Hans Luft, the printer at Wittenberg, is overwhelmed by the demand for Luther's works.

THIS dramatic response to Luther's appeal shows most strikingly his peculiar strength and the part he was to play by divine providence in the Reformation. Luther was the man of the people. Robust, sincere, massively strong, courageous, yet simple as a child, humorous, smiling, generous to a fault, quick, incisive in action, his was the figure, the personality, to crystallize into an avalanche of revolt the unrest that had accumulated for a century.

That he was designed as the leader is seen in the fact that all the other leaders of opposition either turned to him or were forgotten in the deeper issues which he had stirred. Erasmus, the leading intellect, confidant of kings and princes, counselor of popes, endeavored to play a mediating rôle. In a few years he was on the periphery of the tide of change sweeping over Europe. Von Hutten, the knight, poet and scholar, offered to lead an army into the fight if Luther were harmed at the Diet of Worms. Among the group of political reformers, among the intellectuals, and above all in the heart of the silent mass of common people Luther was the man of the hour, the man of destiny.

Superficial people are wont to look for striking intellectual qualities in the great leaders of history and to seek the reason of their success in the novelty of their thought. As a rule they are doomed to disappointment. The great leader is the eldest son of his age, combining in his person all the yearning of his people, feeling more deeply all their wrongs, striking from the white heat of righteous passion thunderbolts that free. Such was Luther, the eldest son of a tempestuously great age, the fore-fighter whom his people followed because his hopes were theirs.



Martin Luther at Worms

THE calmer thought of the twentieth century has often deplored the fact that the Reformation was so turbulent, has regretted that Luther was so thoroughly the fighting man. But the one thing needed was a fighting man. A century of vain effort had proved that the authority of the Catholic Church had to be destroyed before true liberty could come. "To destroy it was no easy matter. Even such a polemic as Luther was, the most gifted and effective history has seen, would have failed utterly had he not offered the world something as satisfying to take the place of the institution he attacked." (McGiffert.)

The question of priority has been raised between Luther and Zwingli. It was Zwingli himself who first raised it, maintaining that he had taught the inefficacy of indulgences before the posting of Luther's theses. Later partizans have frequently raised the issue again. In the progress and achievements of the Reformation the question of priority is insignificant compared with the deeper question of personal leadership and influence. Dr. Lindsay frankly states that in that respect Luther stands alone in his day and generation, unapproachable by any other.

Dr. Lindsay also points out the differences in temperament and occasion for revolting of either man. Luther was a deeply religious soul who had come to the parting of the ways by a religious experience that rocked him to the very depth. Faith, God's grace, communion with God, were massive realities to him, to be felt, experienced and lived, rather than to be apprehended by cold dissecting reason. In that temper he attacked the indulgence traffic, moved by deepest sympathy for his misguided people, fired by righteous wrath against the greed of the selfish shepherds of Christ's flock.

Zwingli said. "Oh, the folly of it! The crass, unmitigated stupidity of it all!" Zwingli came to be the religious reformer through the enlightenment of humanism. Luther entered his cause through the chastening grace of God's pardon for sin.

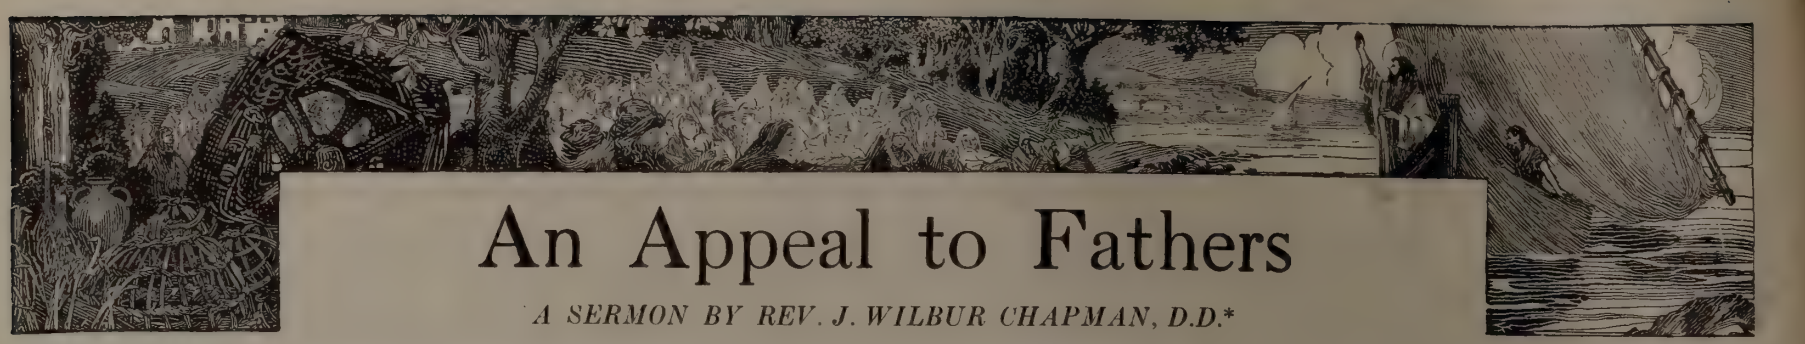
BUT though it was given to Luther to be the leader in bringing the church out of the Babylonian captivity, this does not detract from the eminent qualities of Zwingli as a reformer, nor from his services in the work of establishing the Reformation in those lands which he swayed. His attainments are unquestioned. The reformed church of Switzerland, Germany, Holland and America bears ample testimony to the enduring qualities of his work.

Calvin was not a contemporary of Luther and Zwingli. He began his career a generation later than either, after the Reformation had become an established fact. Even Geneva, the seat and center of his reformatory labors, had been prepared for the Reformation through Farel and others before his coming. It is doubtful whether Calvin could have played the rôle of the pioneer who will rouse mankind to heroic action. Calvin was cold, intellectual, the theologian, the organizer, the disciplinarian among the Reformers. Melanchthon calls him frankly "the theologian" par excellence. In logical cohesion and systematic completeness his "Institutes" stand unrivaled in the literature of that period. His commentaries on the Bible also are recognized to this day among the greatest of commentaries.

HIS talent and ability are recognized from the extent of his influence. Dr. Schaff well says: "Calvin made little Geneva for a hundred years the Protestant Rome and the best-disciplined church in Christendom. History furnishes no more striking example of a man of so little personal popularity and yet such great influence upon the people, of such natural timidity and bashfulness combined with such strength of intellect and character, and such control over his and future generations. He was by nature and taste a retiring scholar, but Providence made him an organizer and ruler of churches."

Especially must Calvin's work and influence be recognized by America in recalling the origin and history of her free institutions. It was Calvin's spirit which traveled northward into France, Holland and England, awakening the Huguenots, the sturdy men of the Low Countries, the Puritans. It roused in them that implacable love for freedom which made Holland the first republic, and brought to the bleak New England shores the first band of Puritans on the Mayflower, planting here the seeds of democracy.

Great men are as a rule the last to desire comparison of their work with the labor and merits of their co-workers.. They are the first and most generous to recognize the assistance rendered by those that cluster about them. In the midst of the great conflict they feel too strongly the insignificance of the individual. Luther was thus. He was humble and self-abasing. In his work he was carried along solely by a strong sense of his divine mission. Of Calvin he thought very highly. With Zwingli he could not come to an agreement, because their spirit and temper were so totally apart. Calvin also was humble to the extreme. Of Luther he said: "It is not so much Luther who speaks, as God, whose lightning bursts from his lips. To each was given a sphere of action, and each labored according to his talent and endowment; and their work stands to this day to prove the workmanship which they brought to it."



An Appeal to Fathers

*A SERMON BY REV. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D.

TEXT—Gen. 18 : 19. "He will command his children and his household after him."

YOU will always do well to tie to a man in whom God has confidence, and whom God is willing to trust, and with whom God is ready to walk in closest fellowship. Abram was such a man, therefore we must of necessity be interested in him, and as we study him carefully we shall find in his life many valuable lessons, and shall learn many things which will help us in our daily walk and conversation. From the day when he left Ur of the Chaldees, going out he knew not whither, but only knowing that he had the divine call and must answer it, trusting in the God whom he had so faithfully followed and inspired by the vision of the day of Christ which would ultimately break upon the sin-cursed earth, to the day when he fell asleep and was placed with his beloved dead in the cave of Macpelah, God could trust him, and this is the highest tribute that can be paid to any one.

In order that we may appreciate the worth of his character and the strength of his trust, it will be well to go back a little way in the story and see him as, with Lot his nephew, the other members of his household, and a great company of servants, he journeys day after day.

One of the finest things that can be said concerning him was this: that as they journeyed there was trouble with the servants of Lot and Abram, and, according to the record, "Abram said unto Lot, let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we be brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left. And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest unto Zoar." (Gen. 13 : 8-10.) And when he had made this generous statement to Lot, and having been forsaken by his nephew, he stood alone. Then God spake to him. "And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee. Then Abram removed his tent, and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre, which is in Hebron, and built there an altar unto the Lord." (Gen. 13 : 14-18.)

God can always trust the man who allows Him to choose for him the way in which he should go, the friends with whom he should have fellowship, and the place of his abode.

How much of your life plan have you given over to God?

I WONDER how many men of business, before they have finally entered upon a business career with a partner, have gone alone to talk the matter out with God, and have asked themselves the question, "Will this partnership be for the glory of God?" or "In this partnership shall I be able to advance the interests of the Kingdom of God?" or "In fellowship with this man with whom I propose a business engagement, shall I day by day be made better and truer?" I have no doubt at all but that such questions as these will cause many a man to say, "This has been the last thing I have considered in a business arrangement." And failure to consider such a proposition is the secret of many a man's undoing.

How many of us stop in the pursuit of pleasure to ask ourselves the question, "Will it be possible for me to have fellowship with God in this pleasure? Will it mean my being drawn closer to him? Would I be afraid in this proposed pleasure to have the realization that his eye was upon me?"

Such questions as these would very easily settle the whole problem of life, so far as pleasure is concerned, and keep us from falling into the traps set for us by the great enemy of our souls.

How many Christians, when seeking a new place of residence, have sought counsel with God to ask such questions as these: "Will it be possible for me in my new home to live for God, or shall I be tempted to turn from him?" "Will this place of residence help me in the management of my home and the bringing up of my children?" Alas, it is true that the most of us choose our homes without reference to God, and then we wonder why it is our hearts are made to ache by disobedient children, or are all but broken by boys and girls who go to destruction.

Too few of us are like Abram; too many of us are like Lot. We choose our own friends, our own business associates, our own places of abode, and it would be well for us to contrast the glorious ending of Abram's life and the miserable defeat which Lot faced. Studying this contrast, I am persuaded that we would the more earnestly seek to have God's approval, and to be the more worthy of his trust and confidence.

ONE of the most beautiful pictures of Abram's life is found in that portion of his experience when one day at high noon he sat at his tent door, and suddenly three angels appeared before him, and the tent, which was very ordinary, becomes exceedingly beautiful because of the angels' visit.

One of the visitors was the Angel of the Covenant, and the Angel of the Covenant in the Old Testament is our Lord himself. Happy the man in whose home or presence the Lord can tarry, and with whom he loves to abide. A tent is changed into a palace, and the most ordinary home into a mansion with such a guest.

It is well to remember that He will not stay where there is contention and strife. The atmosphere will drive him forth. He cannot tarry where there are inconsistencies, where the members of the family circle profess one thing and live another. He will not find pleasure in stopping where there is worldliness, and it is a sad, sad fact that in many professed Christian homes the Lord cannot stop.

Do not forget that while three angels visited Abram, only two came to Lot when he was in Sodom. The Angel of the Covenant seems to be absent when Lot is visited.

Do you really think he could tarry in your home as it is today? How about the library and the books that are there antagonistic to him, suggestive of doubt, or with an influence which would lead one at least to become indifferent to him? How about the living-room, with the magazines tossed so carelessly upon the table, periodicals which have the power to injure your children and those who sit about your fireside? How about the conversation which has been so thoughtless, in some instances so critical, and at other times so unkind? It is a sad thing, but, alas, it is true, that many a so-called Christian home is devoid of the best influence for good today, because in spite of its magnificent furnishings the Lord cannot tarry there, however much he may desire to do so.

My message in the main is to fathers, or to those who have beautiful memories of fathers. I know quite well that about a mother's name the most sacred memories cluster; that to many this is the sweetest name in the English language, with the possible exception of the name of our Lord himself; but I would pay a tribute to fathers, while I do not forget the influence of a mother—fathers possessed of great strength and beautiful tenderness; fathers the passion of whose lives has been the bringing-up of their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

The Bible has many a picture of great fathers—fathers like Jacob, who said with a breaking heart, "Me ye have bereft of my children; Joseph is not, Simeon is not, and now ye will take Benjamin from me." Fathers like David, who, when he learned that Absalom was dead, staggered down from between the gates crying, "O Absalom, my son, my son! would God I had died for thee." Fathers like the father of the prodigal, who never forgot his boy in his wandering, and who started forth to meet him when he was homeward bound, saluting him with a kiss, clothing him with a robe, placing shoes upon his feet, a ring upon his hand, and then led him back to the old home which was soon to be filled with sounds of rejoicing.

BUT we are not shut up to Holy Writ for beautiful pictures of fathers. Think of your own father in his consistent living (and if you did not have such a father, God pity you and help you to spare your children from such a memory); think of his prayers offered with tremulous tones; think of his life so consistent and true; think of his Bible so well worn and so tear-stained, and then strive to be like him as he was like Christ.

The position of a father is solemn indeed. Too few of us appreciate what it means to be the head of a household. "I charge you," said a dying mother to her husband, the father of her children, "bring all these children home with you and I shall meet you on the other side." And God has given us the same charge.

I pity the man who is so immersed in business, so taken up with pleasure, or so given to sin, that he allows his children to drift and to make wreck and ruin of their lives.

There are many reasons why God could say of Abram, "I know him." First, when God called him in Ur of the Chaldees, he obeyed without question. Have you obeyed him? He has bidden you confess him before men. The confession of Christ is the acceptance of Christ. It means the turning from sin. It implies the turning unto God, and you cannot expect your children to do this until you have done it yourself. Noah entered the Ark; then his children passed in.

God has bidden you to establish in your home a family altar. Have you obeyed him?

John G. Paton tells of his father in his home life and says: "Every day of my father's life after he became the head of a household he began with prayer. He was never too busy, never too sick, there were never too many people around, to keep him from praying with his family. Three times each day he used to slip into a little closet in our house and pray, and we children got so we tiptoed past the door at these times of prayer, for we heard him speaking our names."

God has commanded you to do this; have you obeyed him? He has also commanded you to speak to your children concerning their spiritual welfare. It is a sad thing that many a father feels that the minister may do this for him, or the special worker may do it, or the mother may do it, but that father is recreant to his trust who neglects to speak for himself to his children about their acceptance of Christ. God has thus commanded you; have you obeyed him?

GOD could also trust Abram, because he knew of his spirit of intercession for Lot. In Genesis 18 : 20-33 we read: "And the Lord said, Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous; I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know. And the men turned their faces from thence, and went toward Sodom: but Abraham stood yet before the Lord. And Abraham drew near, and said, Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city: wilt thou also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein? That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked: and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from thee: Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? And the Lord said, If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then I will spare all the place for their sakes. And Abraham answered and said, Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, which am but dust and ashes: Peradventure there shall lack five of the fifty righteous: wilt thou destroy all the city for lack of five? And he said, If I find there forty and five, I will not destroy it. And he spake unto him yet again, and said, Peradventure there shall be forty found there. And he said, I will not do it for forty's sake. And he said unto him, Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak: Peradventure there shall thirty be found there. And he said, I will not do it, if I find thirty there. And he said, Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord: Peradventure there shall be twenty there found. And he said, I will not destroy it for twenty's sake. And he said, Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak yet but this once: Peradventure ten shall be found there. And he said, I will not destroy it for ten's sake. And the Lord went his way, as soon as he had left communing with Abraham: and Abraham returned unto his place." And from this incident we learn that God can always trust the man who is concerned for others.

The supreme test of his life, however, came when God commanded him to take Isaac and journey with him to an altar which He would show him. Picture these three days, if you can, when the father walks with white set face, with the boy repeatedly questioning him, and the father saying, "My son, God will show us what we must do," and Abraham is willing to place his son upon the altar and sacrifice his life

The Strength of the Insignificant

SUNDAY, October 28. Isa. 41 : 14, 15. "Fear not, thou worm Jacob. . . . I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument with teeth." It would be scarcely possible to find two images in more violent contrast than these. On the one hand is a worm, which a harrow can tear in pieces. And on the other hand is an instrument with teeth, a thing which can break other things in pieces. That is the contrast—a worm, soft, helpless and trodden on: and an instrument with teeth, firm, positive, impressive, ascendant! And the Lord God is to change the one into the other. The commanding word is spoken of a people, but the promise is equally and gloriously true as addressed to the individual. Our God can endow the weakling with strength and character, by which he shall be able to write his services in deep, clear letters upon the life of his generation. He can transform the worm, and possess it with a force by which it shall leave its mark upon the fellowship of the race.

The miracle has been witnessed ten thousand thousand times. The life that appeared very weak and helpless has been marvelously converted into impressive strength. I suppose that if we could trace the influence of the slave Onesimus we should see that it had made deep marks on the life of his master Philemon. Many a noble lineament in the character of Philemon was probably due to the strong but unconscious pressure of his now transformed and consecrated slave. The splendid spiritual loyalty of the servant etched many a fine line in the countenance of the saint. And if we knew everything I wonder what we should see of the influence of the transformed John Mark upon the apostle Paul. Mark had been a weakling, so weak indeed that Paul wished to discard him as unfitted for the high honors and tremendous tasks of the missionary of the cross. But the Lord laid an invigorating hold on the worm John Mark, and I am wondering what distinguishing lines he engraved upon the glorious character of the apostle who was once willing to cast him away!

This transforming power is, in Christ Jesus, the promised and privileged possession of everybody. Thomas Carlyle wrote in one of his essays: "The genuine use of gunpowder I believe to be that it makes all men alike tall." Yes, gunpowder makes the little Japanese the height of the British grenadier! And the marvelous power of the Holy Spirit, which transforms mere worms into magnificent instruments of grace, makes wonderful work of small and commonplace folk! "Things that are not" are used to "bring to nought things that are!" Mere nothings are allied with omnipotence. The slenderest wire becomes the channel of the electric current. The humblest slave enters into the fellowship of Jesus Christ. "Ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you." That is the transforming Minister, and he is every day engaged on his miraculous work. "I know not the man!" There's the worm! "When they saw the boldness of Peter!" There's the threshing instrument with teeth! Pentecost had been!

The Divine Standard of Goodness

MONDAY, October 29. Ps. 4 : 6. "There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us." These words may have been uttered at a time of war or famine or pestilence or widespread corruption in social life. It was a dark day, and yet not so dark as it seemed, for there were those who clung to their belief in goodness and in God. No age is wholly hopeless so long as even a remnant of the people cling to God, though like the man in Browning's poem, "Instans Tyrannus," they only "catch at God's skirts."

Doubtless vast numbers of people are reappraising the values of life. Some things which once seemed good no longer appear so. What is left? What have we which is still good, held up and looked at in the light of God's truth? Certainly love is good, pure love, the capacity of a soul to fix its affection upon something outside of itself, and to serve that something whether it be a person, or a cause, or a country—serve it to the death. Certainly courage is good: not merely the courage of the battlefield, but the courage of the silent sufferer at home; the courage of the optimist who holds that sometimes God is most present when he seems most absent from human affairs. And certainly honor is good; that is to say, right behavior from right motives. Our deliberate and habitual choice of motives determines our character, and high character is not only good, but it is unchangeably the best output and product of life.

It seems not to matter much to God whether our lives are comfortable or not; whether we live in large houses or small; whether our lives are long or short. It does matter everything to God and to us that we keep our hearts pure and our hands clean; that we brace our souls to serve and suffer for the right as God gives us to see the right.

Renewed in Mind

TUESDAY, October 30. Eph. 4 : 22-24. "Put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and be renewed in the spirit of your mind; and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." The manifestation of the Christian life is here represented as a metamorphosis, not of the physical organism or the essential parts of the human being who is a Christian, but of his inmost being. The Christian who has accepted Christ as the Canceler of his sin, his Surety and Advocate, still finds in himself his old self, "the old man." He still feels the prompting of sin in the form of "lusts," desires, cravings, suggestions. These promptings are recorded in his consciousness with plausible reasons; their evil character is masked by good intentions, in order to deceive the Christian and to entice him to the commission of the wrongful act. This is the Christian's old self, always teeming with sinful propensities.

Over and against this there is asserted in the Christian a new principle of thought and action. The same faith which at first grasped the divine pardon for sin unto the justification of the Christian begins at once to operate as a means for his sanctification. He becomes "renewed in the spirit of his mind." The old lusts in him no longer have everything their own way; they are opposed by new desires and aspirations, which tend toward righteousness and true holiness. His life begins to assume a godlike aspect; the child is beginning to take after his Father who begat him in a new spiritual birth. Into this silent change that is going on within him the Christian enters with a holy zest.

This wonderful process is continued throughout the natural life of the Christian, and aims at developing the Christian "unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

Sheep and Shepherd

WEDNESDAY, October 31, John 10 : 11. "I am the good Shepherd." The picture of the lost sheep by the artist Alfred Soord is the most real, natural and thrilling of all the representations of the Good Shepherd in art. Some have portrayed the Shepherd in fine garments, with a pretty lamb in his bosom; but Soord has arrayed him with a rough jacket, rawhide shoes and a big club, as he leans over the precipice to rescue the lost sheep.

One day, when this painting was hanging in an office, tears were seen coming down the cheeks of a business man. When asked what the trouble was, he replied, "I have been looking at that painting, and thinking how truly it pictures me. I was just where that sheep is; I had lost my way; there was nothing below but the bottomless pit, and the eagles were coming down. It was then Christ found me and saved me."

How well the sinner is symbolized by the lost sheep! Almost any other animal can find its way home, even when we try our best to lose it; but a sheep never knows the direction to the fold. It seems perfectly helpless in its lostness. The true shepherd, hearing the cry of the wanderer, naturally leaves the ones that are safe and secure while he searches for the strayed one in the desert or mountain. So Jesus ever lays down his life for the sheep, and in his risen glory goes forth to bring the wanderers home.

The Healing Vision

THURSDAY, November 1. Heb. 2 : 9. "We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, . . . crowned with glory and honor." Wonderful is the sight of the eye. More wonderful is the sight of the mind. Most wonderful is the sight of the soul. To see Jesus spiritually is to have such a consciousness of his presence as is ours when we accept literally his promise, "I am with you alway, even unto the end of the ages." This was the experience of the first martyr, who, stoned by his persecutors, his hair all matted and his eyes blinded by blood, cried out, "I see the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God." This too was the experience of that more modern martyr in England who faced the flames all unafraid, declaring that at his side he saw the Christ for whose testimony he gave his life.

Singularly, this verse describes Jesus in the same words in which we ourselves are described in the earlier verses of this chapter, "made a little lower than the angels." Herein is reaffirmed the true humanity of Jesus. We are a little lower than the angels, and so was Jesus in the days of his flesh. Higher than the angels, Lord of angels, he left his divine sovereignty and superiority behind him when he "saw us plunged in deep distress and flew to our relief." With hardly a pause the apostle reaffirms also the true divinity of Christ, "crowned with glory and honor." In the heavens into which he ascended, leading captivity captive, he is crowned with glory. In the church on earth which acknowledges his lordship he is crowned with honor.

What if we do see Jesus? Ah, how we are affected by what we see! How sensitive souls are impressed by the sight of lofty mountains or vast seas! There is something of the ruggedness of New England hills in New England philosophy. How the sight of human greatness or goodness affects us with awe, moves us to heroism, incites us to higher endeavor! To use John Bunyan's figure of speech, truth often enters the town of Mansoul through Eye Gate. This being so, with truth may enter peace and power. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

Gratitude to God

FRIDAY, November 2. Eph. 5 : 20. "Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." Continual thankfulness is one of the criteria of the Christian's state of grace and of the indwelling in him of the Holy Spirit. The Christian is not only a cheerful person in his social intercourse with fellow believers and men in general, but there is in his mind at all times a solemn thoughtfulness and an attitude of lively observation. He is conscious of the presence of God in every condition in which he finds himself, and he sees in all happenings in the daily routine of his life the gracious interposition of the hand of God for his protection and improvement. All his joys and sorrows become revelations to him of the fatherly interest which God takes in him. Uninterruptedly he finds reasons for gratitude to the kind Providence which arranges all affairs of this life for him in such a manner that they work together for his good. He may be smarting under some divine chastisement, but it will not be long before he recognizes the salutary lesson imparted to him by his adversities.

Such a state of mind is indeed possible only for him who has found God in Christ. In Jesus Christ God has come to us; therefore we in turn come to him in the name of Jesus Christ. Without Christ we would have no God whom we should feel incited to extol and magnify. Outside of Christ God is to every man a terrible being. But in Christ he is become the Father, from whom every good and perfect gift comes down to man. For Christ's sake, then, the grateful prayers of Christians ascend to God unceasingly.

The Sackcloth

SATURDAY, November 3. Esther 4 : 2. "None might enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth." Kirgs and millionaires living in luxury, power and pleasure in our day do not like to be disturbed by people in mourning and sorrow. Palaces of earthly splendor are not the places to go for comfort. They often produce the agony of homeless, childless people, but they do not attempt to cure the malady. True, they give their wealth to the lazar-house for Lazarus and the leper, but they say, "Don't bring the wrecked people into my palace of royalty, where I am reclining for rest and recuperation. Let our joy here be unconfined; this is one of the divine rights of kings to never even look upon sackcloth."

What if Almighty God had only sent his angels with the crumbs from his table to feed a lost world lying at the gate of his Paradise? Jesus came himself, touched with the feelings of our infirmities, loving his sackcloth subjects so much that he suffered a deeper sorrow, bore a heavier cross, that an agonizing world might bask in the beauty of his bright home forever, where sackcloth is changed for robes of righteousness, where hunger gives way at his sumptuous table of holy communion and friendship. Christ wore the sackcloth on Gethsemane and on Calvary, that he might clothe us with the salvation which he had with the Father before the world was. He insists that we shall all come within the gates of the celestial city of peace and have a seat with him on the throne of his glory.

The Church and Her Critics

IN a recent issue of the Constructive Quarterly, which is an open forum for the expression of current religious thought, a distinguished English churchman, Dean Mozley of Pembroke College, Cambridge, discusses "The Church and the World." Recognizing that "the times which have come upon us make true thought concerning the relations of the Church and the world an urgent need," he advances the view that it is urgent for the world, since the Church is too great a fact to be ignored. And he believes that the reaction must come from a true knowledge of what the Church stands for and what her presence means for the world. He regards the Church's critics as handicapped considerably by their indifference to theology, while theology means so much to the Church that she has no "power to escape from it, except by an act of suicide which would involve the triumph of the gates of Hades."

We do not believe, however, that the criticism of the Church, though markedly increasing in the last few years, is based on theological grounds, to any dangerous extent. Dean Mozley is quite correct in assuming that a contempt for theology would be the worst possible starting point in any criticism of the Church. The real cause of the estrangement, which he so candidly admits to be a serious one, is that the world has lost confidence, not in the religion of Jesus Christ, but in the attitude of the Church as the interpreter of that religion. Its spiritual vision, by which it specially appealed to the hearts of men, and which has been the greatest source of its power, has become dim and indefinable. The claim is made, both by critics within and without, that the Church is no longer the hope of the poor, the outcast, the despairing. And the Church's failure at a time when humanity is called to face its greatest trial, and when it was worth while to have ventured much, if not all, for those who looked to the Church at this crisis, has helped to precipitate a condition which the distinguished Cambridge churchman rightly regards as serious. He complains of the neglect of the Church as "a much more disquieting feature of the times than opposition to it." This also is true, and indeed neglect may be the most effective form of opposition.

WE yield to none in our appreciation of the Church and of the greatness and dignity of her mission. Hence it is to us, as to the great body of Christians throughout the world, an occasion for regret rather than resentment that the Church should have failed to grasp a great opportunity for world service, and should even still be singularly indifferent. Voices from within the Church—the voices of men who, like Dean Mozley, are loyal to the Church's traditions—have spoken with the utmost candor. They have shown the evil, and they have not failed to indicate the remedy. Like the Dean himself, they believe that the Church's office is to help men to spiritual sight, "but first she must see the world as it really is, and so grasp her relation to it."

At a great gathering in London, where many different churches and denominations were represented, including Anglicans, Catholics, Jews, and Nonconformists, several bishops and other religious leaders in their addresses admitted that organized Christianity had shown itself impotent in the great emergency, and that the fault lay equally on both sides of the ocean.

"It is not the Church of England alone which has been weighed and found wanting," writes wise old Washington Gladden. "This world-war is a blight which has fallen upon all Christendom." To which may be added the words of Dr. Slattery of Grace Church, New York, in a recent sermon: "The Church must beat its own breast and ask for itself and all it can reach a straight vision of the truth and the right. The greatest boon which the Church can today bestow upon the world is to give it fresh conviction of immortality."

And if the Church—by which is meant the Christian churches of all denominations regarded as one great organization—if the Church, laying all other issues aside, stood forth as the friend, the adviser, the comforter, and the counselor of the common people of the world, following the method of her Master in her relation with them, she would no longer find them indifferent, but quick and ready in sympathetic response.

The Christian Herald believes that the Church of Christ is becoming fully alive to the situation and to the need of rehabilitation. We may well pass by as of little importance the sensational predictions that are made by those who demand a "new religion." What the world needs is not a new religion, but the restoration, in all its strength and beauty and compelling power, of the religion of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the world's Redeemer.

THE world must not be left leaderless in its search to find out God. It is the Church's task to lead. If she should evade the responsibility, God will assuredly raise leaders to whom he will give mouths to speak and a message such as the world is waiting for. It may be that the old fatuity which has put the Church on the wrong side of many great problems affecting human progress may do so again. But the signs of action within the Church are more than hopeful. She has heard the call and is awakening. Before her lies the great task of leading the warring world back to Christ and to peace—back to the knowledge of God, the Loving Father who has no pleasure in human slaughter. Let the Church gather all of her forces and prepare for the mightiest task she has ever had to undertake.

Has not the Church of Christ in all lands, and by whatever name she is known, within her own ranks enough men of power and consecration, with the old heroic courage that was once her glory and her strength—men who can confront any danger unshrinkingly when God calls? Such men are needed now more than at any time since Luther's day. The old formal platitudes, the easy-going conservatism, the selfish apartness from the world which has led to spiritual indifference, must be cast aside. Souls on fire with zeal for God and humanity must now come to the front. And this applies to all the churches, for all have the same need and each has an equal responsibility.

The Simplicity of Luther

THERE are many excellent lessons to be learned from the experiences of Luther, as he has related them, not a few of which might be utilized with practical advantages by our pastors today. Here is one particular passage which many ministers would do well to keep in view:

"When I preach here," he wrote, "I sink myself deeply down. I regard neither 'doctors' nor 'magistros,' of which are here in the church above forty; but I have an eye to the multitude of young people, children and servants, of which are more than two thousand. I preach to these, and direct myself to them that have need thereof. Will not the rest hear me? The door standeth open to them; they may be gone. I see that the ambition of preachers groweth and increaseth; they will please the worldly-wise, and in the meantime neglect the simple and common multitude."

A plain, simple Gospel message, given in language readily understood by those for whom it was intended—such was the rule of the great Reformer, who repressed all temptations to vain intellectual display, and made himself as nothing that Jesus Christ might be exalted. With intellectual and oratorical ability to "stand before kings," yet he could "sink himself" in giving the message to the lowly ones, even to the children. Surely one of the greatest gifts a minister can desire is that of plain, earnest speech, forgetful of self and caring nothing for the praise of the worldly-wise, but striving eagerly to reach the hearts of those who in all ages have been most willing to give heed—the common people.

Hallowe'en

CURIOUS it is that, on a day dedicated to all the saints on the calendar, evil spirits, fairies and the like are supposed to be holding a sort of magic revel unchecked, or that they should be thought to be better disposed to gratify the desires of inquisitive mortals on this day than any other.

We congratulate ourselves that we are tearing ourselves away from the old-time superstitions. But the truth is that such of the old superstitions as we are getting rid of are tearing themselves away from us. They have gone with the country solitudes, the lonely roads, with the open fireplaces and the dim light of lantern and candle. In the steam-heated, electric-lighted homes of today there is no place for the old genii, either of fire or darkness.

The superstitions that once vapored from isolation as miasma exhales from stagnant pools find no acceptance since we have cobwebbed the land with trolley lines and telephone wires and turned night into day.

So we now laugh at the old fears, the dread old legends and the dear old mysteries. Very true. So far as mere physical phenomena are concerned most of us may have schooled ourselves to disunite them wholly from coming events. But as regards those things which spring from the inner consciousness, the intuitions, the perceptions, the aspirations, the imagination, which if strong enough, is capable of creating and peopling a realm entirely outside of the little life we live—"Ay, there's the rub." It is then we agree with Hamlet:

> "There are more things in heaven and earth,
> Horatio,
> Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

Who will undertake to span the gulf stretching out a shoreless void between the revelations of science and the incomprehensible mysteries of life itself? It is upon that debatable ground that superstition retains a present foothold and like the ivy clinging round old walls defies every attempt to uproot it.

But, happily, through belief in the revelations of God, and faith in his loving care, all that we need to know is clear to us as sunshine.

The Gospel in the Kit

FOR the time being, the soldier boy has entered upon a strange new life. Old environment, old associations, old routine, customs and habits, which have steadily held him in his accustomed groove of thought and feeling, are swept away, and he is a stranger in a new world.

He is at a peculiarly impressionable time of life and in conditions where influences, good and bad, are particularly effective. The soil is fertile for the divine seed of the Gospel.

Military service is not naturally conducive to proper spiritual direction and soul development. In worldly aspect the soldier is but a small cog in a huge mortal machine. His individuality is sacrificed to discipline; his heart aspirations and ideals are swallowed up in the national purpose, and more than ever is he apt to forget that his great duty is direct service to God, that his supreme Captain is Christ, and that the abiding purpose on earth is salvation.

The tens of thousands in the vast camps are busily studying tactics; and shall they be permitted to forget that the great tactics are the Gospel?

From their excitement in new scenes there is to be found calm; from their weariness of the drill is to be had rest; from the monotony of camp routine there is quickening; from the soul-leveling discipline is uplift and release—all in the boundless calm, rest, quickening, uplift and release of the Word of God.

Many thousands of Christian people are helping to supply the soldiers with the Gospel. The help of many thousands more are needed. Not until the Gospel is in the kit of every soldier is Christian duty even well begun.

The Best Friend in the World

"MY mother! She to whom I have turned perhaps too late I find is the best friend I have in the world."

An Ohio girl in trouble in California makes the discovery which many another poor girl in trouble has made.

What a lot of sin and suffering she would have escaped had she thought of her mother and turned to her before beginning her career of shame and folly!

And what is the mother's answer? Here it is:

"My darling girl, mother believes in you and will come if you need her. Let me know what I can do. Lovingly, Mother."

Oh, a mother's devotion—it falters not. She would follow to the end of the world and permit herself to be dragged through the deeps of the sloughs of shame, for her girl. Hers are the first and the last human passion that make earth beautiful and the first to make heaven sweet.

It is only through the love and sacrifice and forgiveness and devotion of the mother for her erring girl that mortal mind can conceive of mortal bliss.

Take away the highest earthly symbol of divinity, and the world would relapse into savagery and heaven become incomprehensible.

For the girl who forgot her mother and her breaking heart in her life of sin, and turns back to her only when there are no others to turn to for love and comfort—for such as she human sympathy is slow. But for the faithful, broken-hearted mother human sympathy breaks through its hard crust of selfishness, as a spring breaks through solid rock, and flows in a living stream that brings verdure and bloom out of dead clay.

This love and devotion of her mother, had she always treasured it and returned it, would have saved her from all the shame and sorrow that is now theirs.

Church Pension Fund $8,712,000

A REPORT of the $5,000,000 pension fund for retired Episcopal clergymen, just made, shows the fund oversubscribed seventy-five per cent. The amount asked was $5,164,555. The amount subscribed is $8,712,000. The campaign for the fund was directed by Bishop William Lawrence of Massachusetts. It ended February 28. The pension system was put into operation the following day, with Bishop Lawrence as president of the fund. Pensions amounting to $203,000 annually are now being paid. Beneficiaries are aged and disabled clergymen, widows and minor orphans. There were 47,713 subscriptions to the fund, but as entire congregations were entered as one donation, it is estimated many hundreds of thousands of persons actually contributed. No record was kept of individual contributors of $2,019,610 which was received in cash. New York City's contribution was $2,131,592. The states of New York and New Jersey gave $3,382,354. New England gave $1,222,768. It took just one year to raise the fund. The Carnegie Corporation made the largest contribution, $324,744. Two persons gave $250,000 each. Nine gave $100,000 each. There were twelve subscriptions of $50,000 and twenty-nine of $25,000. One of the most beautiful and meritorious benevolences ever instituted in this or any other country, in this or any other age, is this caring for aged and disabled ministers. It is the expression of a rich and willing church. The conscience of all denominations, too long asleep on this subject, is being aroused, and a fund for retired ministers is being raised in each one. This nearly nine-million-dollar fund will be a great example and inspiration to all. It is helping to answer this prayer: "Now also when I am old and grayheaded, O God, forsake me not." (Ps. 71 : 18.)

Fight Against Malaria

THE work of Dr. Gorgas in wiping out malarial fever on the Isthmus of Panama was an object-lesson which has encouraged a world-wide campaign against this disorder. A committee on malaria has been formed in the United States, with leading physicians in charge, who are quite active in their warfare against this fever. A pamphlet they have issued announces the fact that there are something like 1,500,000 cases, involving a money loss to the country of $100,000,000 a year. Local societies are being organized to cooperate with this committee. Sin is a disease that attacks the soul. A cure has been revealed. Christ is the physician who can cure it. Why should any sin-sick soul remain uncured? The prophet makes this inquiry: "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?" (Jer. 8 : 22.)

Japanese Embassy Visits Perry's Tomb

THE Mikado sent a Japanese commission to this country for the promotion of friendly interest in commerce, civilization and government, which was received with considerable ceremony and genuine cordiality by various cities from the Pacific to the Atlantic. At the reception in New York Viscount Ishii, the head of the mission, said among other things: "We come to you and you to us in less time than half a century ago it took to travel from New York to New Orleans. Your greatness has been the marvel of the earth. The story of this fabulous Island City of the Western Hemisphere has been almost impossible of belief. But, sir, it is not your stupendous enterprise, your lofty and beautiful structures, or your streets which teem with evidence of skill and the very essence of vitality that impress me most. All that is physical fades from before me and I see here the spirit of the greatest city of the Western world meeting and giving friendly greeting to the spirit of my beloved land on the open field of honest purpose. There is perhaps more in this welcome and in this response than in other greetings so recently exchanged in this historic place between the representatives of Western nations and of your city." It was eminently fitting that Nippon's imperial mission should have in its program a visit to the tomb of Commodore Perry. Commodore Perry was one of the most competent and efficient naval officers the United States ever had. His greatest service and fame were in the visit of his squadron to Japanese waters, and the opening of the door of commerce in Japan to our country and the world. In 1853 he visited Japan and delivered a communication from President Fillmore, and the year following negotiated a treaty which allowed permission to obtain wood, coal and other stores and provisions needed by American ships in Japanese waters, and for our vessels to anchor in the ports of Shimoda and Hakodate; and Japan promised humane treatment to shipwrecked sailors. It was the presence of Perry and his squadron, which looked so strange and threatening to the hermit empire, that opened the door to Japan's present greatness and glory. The visit to Perry's tomb was in grateful recognition of that service. At one of the meetings Ambassador Sato promised that Japan would stand for the integrity of China and the open door. There were royal ambassadors in olden times, and there is this reference to them: "Howbeit in the business of the ambassadors of the princes of Babylon, who sent unto him to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land, God left him to try him, that he might know all that was in his heart." (II Chron. 32 : 31.)

Wonderful Jungle Railway

THE pioneer railroad of the United States used to run through solitary territory where the passengers looking out of the car windows could see deer, bear, buffalo and other game, but such picture is not so wonderful as the people will witness in riding over the new Siam Railroad to be opened soon, running from Bangkok to Penang in the Malay Straits. The road, 700 miles long, has been laid through tropical scenery, with jungle on every side. The journey will occupy from thirty-six to forty hours, and the trains will be equipped with sleeping and restaurant cars. It will open a country which is little known to tourists on account of its inaccessibility. The ripping of this road through the jungles with their savage wild beasts will carry civilization and Christianity to bless benighted districts and illustrates man's mastery over nature. "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands." (Ps. 8 : 6.)

Typhoon Kills 770

AN official statement gives the total casualties in the recent typhoon in Japan as 2,704, including 770 deaths. These figures do not include deaths at sea. One thousand and forty-seven ships of all sizes and descriptions were lost. The relief work is progressing. Tokio has abandoned all plans for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the capital's removal from Kyoto. The funds for the affair will be used for relief. We find here the law of severity and mildness written in nature as it is in human experience and religion. We see also the sweet lesson of charity taught by the Japanese people. The destruction of these 1,000 and more ships reminds us of the storm that wrecked the ship on which Paul was sailing, of which he says: "But not long after there arose against it a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon. And when the ship was caught, and could not bear up into the wind, we let her drive." (Acts 27 : 15, 16.)

Animals from Borneo's Jungles

CHARLES HUGO of Toledo, Ohio, and William Nicola of Monmouth, Ill., dealers, returned to this country recently from Borneo, Sumatra, the Malay Peninsula and other torrid jungle lands, where they had been securing reptiles, birds and wild beasts for the zoological collections in various cities. In the last eighteen months they sent to this country 10,000 animals and birds, which are in the cages of the menageries in one place or another. The prophet illustrates the subduing power of the Gospel on the heart by this reference to the taming of wild beasts: "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them." (Isa. 11 : 6.)

Hazing at West Point

TWELVE members of the third class at the United States Military Academy at West Point were tried by a court martial for hazing four men of the fourth class until they fainted. Cadet Shoults, of Maryland, who was selected as a special victim, in his testimony said that on July 14, when the cadets were in camp, Sayville, who was drillmaster, criticized his personal appearance, and ordered him to appear at a certain tent next day, where, in the presence of other cadets, he was commanded to strip to the waist and to stand on his toes and turn his palms out, which position he held for fifteen minutes and then had to drop to his heels. He was ordered back on his toes, his head thrust back, his chin in but he held on a little longer till things grew dark and he fell forward. He said the same performance was repeated on August 5. The men of the fourth year did not tell of the hazing but the surgeon found four men so seriously injured that he suspected the cruelty, and a committee of investigation was appointed which led to the court martial. Whatever may be the outcome of the trial, hazing at West Point should be stopped at once and for good. A while back a young man was killed by being hazed at the academy, and the nation was aroused, and it was understood that the practice was at an end forever. There are no finer young men in America than our boys at West Point and Annapolis. Let them not only frown on hazing, but also on the spirit that prompts it, and do the manly, soldierly thing of observing the rule: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." (Matt. 7 : 12.)

CHAPTER XV

COURTLAND had run three blocks and turned two corners before he dared stop and set the girl upon her feet again. He looked anxiously at her white face and great, frightened eyes. Her lips were trembling and she was shivering. He tore his overcoat off, wrapped it about her, and before she could protest caught her up again and ran on another block or two.

"Oh, you must not!" she cried. "I can walk perfectly well, and I don't need your coat. Please, please put on your coat and let me walk!"

"I can run better without it," he explained, briefly, "and we can get out of the way of those fellows quicker this way!"

So she lay still in his arms till he put her down again. He glanced at his watch. It was half past one. If only a taxicab would come along! But no taxi was in sight. The girl was begging him to put on his overcoat. She had drawn it from her own shoulder and was holding it out to him insistently. But with the rare smile that Courtland was noted for he wrapped it firmly about her shoulders again.

"Now," said he, firmly, "you're not to take that off again until we get where it is warm. I'm quite used to going out in all weathers without my coat as often as with it. When did you have something to eat?"

"When I left the hospital this evening. I had some strong beef-tea," she answered, airily, as if that had been only a few minutes before.

"How did you happen to be where I found you?" he asked, looking at her keenly.

"Why, I must have missed my way, I think," she explained, "and I felt a little weak from having been in bed so long. I just sat down on a door-step to rest a minute before I went on, and I'm afraid I must have fallen asleep."

"You were walking?" His tone was stern. "Why were you walking?"

A desperate look came into her face. "Well, I hadn't any car fare, if you must know the reason."

THEY were passing a street light as she said it, and he looked down at her fine little white profile in wonder and awe. He felt a sudden choking in his throat and a mist in his eyes. He had it on the tip of his tongue to say, "You poor little girl!" but instead he said, in a tone of intense admiration:

"Well, you certainly are the pluckiest girl I ever saw! You have your nerve with you all right! But you're not going to walk another step tonight!"

And with that he stooped, gathered her up again, and strode forward. He could hear the distant whir of a trolley, and he determined to take it, no matter which way it was going. It would take them somewhere and he could telephone for an ambulance. So he sprinted forward regardless of her protests, and arrived at the next corner just in time to catch the car going cityward.

There was nobody else in the car, and he made her keep the coat about her. He couldn't help seeing how worn and thin her little shabby shoes were, and how she shivered now even in the greatcoat. He saw she was just keeping up her nerve, and he was filled with admiration.

"Why did you run away from the hospital?" he asked suddenly, looking straight into her sad eyes.

"I couldn't afford to stay any longer."

"You made a big mistake. It wouldn't have cost you a cent. That room was free. I made sure of that before I secured it for you."

"But that was a private room!"

"Just a little more private than the wards. That room was paid for and put at the disposal of the doctor to use for whoever he thought needed quiet. Now are you satisfied? And you are going straight back there till you are well enough to go out again! You raised a big row in the hospital running away. They've had the whole force of assistants out hunting you for hours, and your nurse is awfully upset about you. She seems to be crazy over you, anyway. She nearly wept when she telephoned me. And I've been out for hours hunting you.

HE smiled indulgently, but the girl's eyes were full of tears.

"I didn't mean to make all that trouble for people. Why should you all care about a stranger? But, oh! I'm so thankful you came! Those men were terrible!" She shuddered. "How did you happen to come there? I think God must have led you."

"He did!" said Courtland, with conviction.

Nurse Wright was hovering about the hallway when the taxi drew up to the entrance of the hospital, and Bonnie was tenderly cared for at once.

Courtland began to realize that this great hospital was an evidence of the Presence of Christ in the world! He was not the only one who had felt the Presence. Some one moved as he had been tonight had established this big house of healing. There on the opposite wall was a great stained-glass window representing Christ blessing the little children, and the people bringing the maimed and halt and lame and blind to Him for healing.

He began to wonder if the Presence was everywhere, or if there were places where His power was not manifest. There had been the red library! There also had been that church last Sunday.

The office clock chimed softly out the hour of three o'clock. It was Sunday morning. Should he go to church again and search for the Presence, or make up his mind that the churches were out of it entirely and that it was only in places of need and sorrow and suffering that He came? Still, that was not fair to the churches, perhaps, to judge all by one.

There were dark circles under his eyes, and his hair was in a tumble, but he looked good to Nurse Wright as she came down the hall at last to give him her report. She almost thought he was good enough for her Bonnie girl now. She wasn't given to romances, but she felt that Bonnie needed one most mightily about now.

On her way back to her rounds she said to herself: "I believe he's a real man! If I hadn't thought so I wouldn't have told him he might come and see her tomorrow!"

Then she went into Bonnie's room, took the letter with the Western postmark, and stood it up against a medicine-glass on the little table beside the bed, where Bonnie could see it the first thing when she opened her eyes.

CHAPTER XVI

A LITTLE after four o'clock, when Courtland came plodding up the hall of the dormitory to his room, a head was stuck out of Tennelly's door, followed by Tennelly's shoulders attired in a bath-robe. The hair of the head was much tumbled and the eyes were full of sleep. Moreover, there was an anxious, relieved frown on the brows.

"Where 've you been, Court? We were thinking of dragging the river for you. I must say you're the limit! Do you know what time it is?"

"Five minutes after four by the library clock as I came up," answered Courtland, affably. "Say, 'Nelly, go to church with me again this morning? I've found another preacher I want to sample."

"No!" growled Tennelly. "Not on your tin-type! I'm going to get some sleep? What do you take me for? A night nurse? Go to church when I've been up all night hunting for you?"

"Sorry, 'Nelly," said Courtland, cheerfully, "but it was an emergency call. Tell you about it on the way to church. Church doesn't begin till somewhere round 'leven. You'll be calm by that time. So long! See you in church!"

Tennelly slammed his door hard, and Courtland went smiling to his room. He knew that Tennelly would go with him to church. For Courtland had seen among the advertisements in the trolley on his way back to the university the notice of a service to be held in a church away down in the lower part of the city, to be addressed by the Rev. John Burns, and he wanted to go. It might not be the John Burns, of course, but he wanted to see.

Worn out with the events of the night, he slept soundly until ten. Then, as if he had been an alarm-clock set for a certain moment, he awoke.

They went to church.

Tennelly sat down on the hard wooden bench and accepted the worn hymnbook that a small urchin presented him, with an amused stare which finally bloomed into a full grin at Courtland.

"What's eating you, you blooming idiot! Where did you rake up this dump, anyway?"

BUT Courtland's eyes were already fixed on the bright, intelligent face and red hair of the man who stood behind the cheap little pulpit. He was the same John Burns! A window just behind the platform, set with crude red and blue and yellow lights of cheap glass, sent its radiance down upon his head, and the yellow bar lay across his hair like a halo; behind him in the colored lights there seemed to stand the Presence. It was so vivid to Courtland at first that he drew in his breath and looked sharply at Tennelly, as if he, too, must see—though he knew there was nothing visible, of course, but the lights—the glory, and the little, freckled, earnest man giving out a hymn.

And the singing! If one were looking for discord, well, it was there, every shade of it that the world had ever known! But the melody lifted itself in a great voice on high and seemed to bear along the spirit of the congregation.

> I need thee every hour.
>   Stay thou near by;
> Temptations lose their power
>   When thou art nigh.
> I need thee, oh, I need thee,
>   Every hour I need thee;
> O bless me now, my Saviour,
>   I come to thee!

These people, then, knew about the Presence, loved it, longed for it, understood its power! They sang of the Presence and were glad!

Tennelly sat gazing around him, highly amused, not attempting to suppress his mirth. His eyes fairly danced as he observed first one absorbed worshiper, and then another, intent upon the song. He could make the fellows die laughing with a take-off of all this.

He looked at Courtland to enjoy it with him, and lo! Courtland was singing with as much earnestness as the rest; and upon his face there sat a high, exalted look that he had never seen there before. Was it true that the fire and the sickness had really affected Court's mind, after all?

DURING the prayer Courtland dropped his head and closed his eyes.

Tennelly sat back in wonder and tried to listen. It was all about a mysterious companionship with God, stuff that sounded like "rot" to him; uncanny, unreal, mystical, impossible! Could it be that so sensible and scholarly and sane a mind as Court's could take up with a superstition like that? For it was to Tennelly foolishness.

He owned to a certain amount of interest in the emotional side of the sermon. It was true that the little man could sway that uncouth audience mightily. He felt himself swayed in the tenderer side of his nature, but of course his superior mind realized that it was all emotion; interesting as a study, but not to be taken seriously for a moment. It wasn't a healthy thing for Court to see much of this sort of thing. All this talk of a cross, and one dying for all! Mere foolishness and superstition! Very beautiful, and perhaps allegorical, but not at all practical!

The minister was down by the door before they got out, and grasped Courtland's hand as if he were an old friend, and then turned and grasped Tennelly's. There was something so genuine and sincere about his face that Tennelly decided that he must really believe all that junk he had been preaching.

"Seems to be a good sort," he murmured to Courtland. "Pity he's tied down to that sort of thing!"

Courtland looked at him sharply. "Is that the way you feel about it, 'Nelly?" There was something half wistful in his tone.

Tennelly looked at him sharply. "Why, sure! I think he's a bigger man than his job, don't you?"

"Then you didn't feel it?"

"Feel what?"

"The Presence of God in that place!"

THERE was something so simple and majestic about the way Courtland made the extraordinary statement—not as a common fanatic would make it, nor even as one who was testing and feeling around for confirmation of a hope, but as one who knew it to be a fact beyond questioning, which the other merely hadn't been able to see—that Tennelly was almost embarrassed.

"Why—I— Why—no! I can't say that I noticed any particular manifestation. I was entirely too much taken up by the smell to observe the occult. Say, what's eating you, anyway, Court? You know a thing like this can get on your nerves if you let it. Suppose we go and take a ride in the park this afternoon. It's a great day."

"I don't mind riding in the park for a while after dinner. I've got a date about four o'clock. But nothing's getting on my nerves. I never felt better or happier in my life. I feel as if I'd been blind always, and had just got my eyes open to see what a wonderful thing life really is."

"Do you mean you've got what they used to call 'religion,' Court? 'Hit the trail,' as it were?"

Courtland shook his head. "Not that I know of, 'Nelly. I never attended one of those big evangelistic meetings in my life, and I don't know exactly what 'religion,' as they call it, is, so I can't lay claim to anything of that sort. What I mean is, simply, I've met God face to face and found he's my friend. I'd like to tell you about it, Tennelly."

"Wait a while, Court," said Tennelly, half shrinking. "Wait till you've had a little more time to think it over. Then if you like I'll listen. I'll let you know when I'm ready to hear."

Late that afternoon, when Courtland entered the hospital, the sunshine was flooding the great stained-glass window and glorifying the face of the Christ with the outstretched hands. Off in a near-by ward some one was singing to the patients, and the corridors seemed hushed to listen.

Why Not?

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

I READ the story, yesterday, of a young girl who did special work on a newspaper—reportorial work that had to do with human interest features, and difficult stories, and involved interviews. The girl was quite famous in the newspaper world because she never failed to make good in an assignment.

She was a little girl, delicate and pretty and ultra-feminine. She could not go after a story in a man's way with a man's strength and aggressiveness. But she always succeeded, because, when the editor called her imperatively into his private office and said to her, "Can you do this?" or "Will you be able to see him?" or "I must have your copy in an hour!" she would always throw back her head and grit her teeth and say, the flicker of a smile in her eyes,

"Why not?"

Every story, every interview, every bit of human interest was, to her, a gauntlet thrown down by fate. And she would pick up the gauntlet, not at all brazenly, not at all in a conceited way, but with a little, whimsical, half-question.

NEVER dare to say, "I can't!"
Never say it.
Would you take a butterfly,
Vivid, from the dawning sky
Just to slay it?
Life's a game that God has made,
We must play it!

Never dare to say, "I can't!"
It's all wrong!
Playing, bravely, in His Name,
Do your best to win the game,
With a song.

Never dare to say, "I can't!"
Take your cue
From the sunshine and the air,
From the flowers everywhere
Fresh with dew . . .
God has given them a game
Same as you!

Never dare to say, "I can't!"
To your lot;
God has given you a game:
Play it, squarely, in His Name—
Say, "Why not?"

I REMEMBER the time, during the last of my school days, when I encountered plane geometry for the first time. Mathematics had always been hard for me, all the way up from the first multiplication table; but I had struggled along through the primary and grammar years, just barely passing.

And then came plane geometry. Unlike its name, it was far from plain. As I looked at the seemingly easy problems it seemed to me to be quite hopelessly involved—a very labyrinth of figures.

I will never forget how, after an hour's fight with two triangles (I had to prove that they were exactly alike, and though I could see that they were—though by measuring them painstakingly with a ruler I could know that they were—I could not prove it), I went to our professor of mathematics. He was a little man with a small frown that was more humorous than stern, and he looked up from the papers he was correcting, with a questioning glance, as I neared his desk.

"Well?" he half-snapped. "Well!"

"I can't do it," I told him very unhappily. "I just can't do it!"

The professor took the book from my hands with a quick, almost snatching movement that was wholly characteristic of him. He looked, hard at the problem (and to him it must have been ridiculously simple), and then he looked hard at me.

"Well," he barked, "why not?"

I took the book back into my hands. I was a bashful child and, under his humorous scowl, my eyes searched the floor.

"I—I don't know!" I stammered. And I didn't.

"Then," said the professor, going back to the papers he had been correcting, "there's no reason, is there, why you can't do it? I'll call on you tomorrow in class."

It was the end of the interview, and I went back to my seat.

I struggled over that problem all through my study period. I worked over it at home that evening. Every time I gave up in despair, the professor's short "Well, why not?" would ring in my ears, and I would find that I had no answer to the question. I kept at the problem until I had proved that the two triangles were alike. And the next morning, the professor, hearing my startlingly complete recitation in class, smiled knowingly into my rather proud face.

I wish I could add that I took a special interest, after that, in plane geometry. I wish I might say that I fought my way, step by step, to the head of my class. But I didn't! I barely passed my final examination in plane geometry, which, somehow, never did become exactly plain to me. And yet I knew, as I gazed at my just-passing mark—I knew that I would have failed, very miserably, if it had not been for the professor's curt and unanswerable question. And I think that he knew it, too, and that he was prouder of my almost-too-low mark than of the effortless hundred per cent. of the class genius.

THAT'S why the little story I read about the reporter girl held a special charm and interest for me. That's why it brought back the almost forgotten schoolroom scene—the almost forgotten professor, and the hated plane geometry, which I fear I shall always remember unpleasantly. That's why it set me thinking again along an old and useful channel.

The professor and the girl had both stumbled on a splendid truth that any one who does not want to be a failure should apply. They had stumbled on the fact that "Why not?" was—in most cases—a quite unanswerable question, a question to stimulate ambition, to make failure something of a disgrace.

None of you, friends of mine, want to be failures. You want to play the game of life honestly, squarely, and successfully. And yet every one of you, at one time or another, will find yourself in the position that I was in when I said that I couldn't solve my geometry problem. Only, usually, the problem is more vital than any tangle of triangles could be.

You'll be, perhaps, at the place where one line of your work is conflicting with another line of it. And you'll say, "I can't do the work. I'll have to let the whole thing drop. I can't make good!" Or you'll be at the crossroads of your journey, where the paths branch out so abruptly and mysteriously that you'll be forced to cry, "I can't go on!" Or you'll be in the place where hope and faith are slipping—where life itself seems less than worth while—and you'll sob in despair, "I'm through! It's too much for me. I can't finish my task!"

There are very few people, I guess, who haven't been gripped by the can't-go-on feeling. There are very few people who haven't felt that they were fast coming to the end of—everything. Napoleon must have felt it as he struggled through the snows of Russia with a suffering, doubting army struggling after. Washington, freezing at Valley Forge, might—if only for a minute—have wondered if the game were worth the candle! Lincoln, with his country divided and slaying itself, must have known his dark, hopeless dawns when he was forced to say, in the anguish of his soul, "I can't finish my task! It's too much for me!" Helen Keller, Florence Nightingale, Jane Addams—a score of heroic figures—have doubtless felt the touch of discouragement and defeat. And yet all of them made themselves go on—refused to admit their inability to play the game life!

And so, when you're at the place where your great problem is confronting you, don't forget to ask yourself a question! Say a "Why not?" for every "I can't!" And you'll find that you're ashamed to answer your own words—that you're ashamed to own up to your inefficiency—that you can only hang your head and say—

"I don't know why not!"

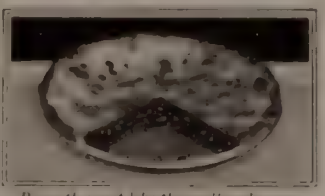
And when you realize that you don't know why not, it's a short and easy step to the place where you'll be concentrating harder than ever on your problem and finding a real way to solve it!

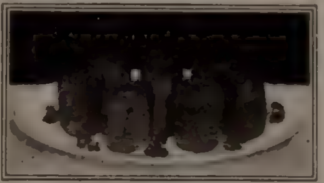
Bake and fry deliciously!

It is a delight to roll out such a fine, smooth dough



Pie with crust like this will make your reputation as a cook!

When the lard is piping hot, put them in. Watch the delicate brown crust form at once



Such dainty, tempting croquettes! Such a crisp, brown crust! Your family will love them

DO you make tender, flaky pie-crust? Do you fry croquettes and potatoes that are brown-crusted, yet soft and flavory inside?

To bake and fry most deliciously, you must select your lard with utmost care. It should be of just the right consistency, neither too soft nor too stiff. It was with this essential principle in mind that Swift's "Silverleaf" Brand Pure Lard was prepared.

Makes delicious pie-crust!

Swift's "Silverleaf" is exactly right for shortening. It works into the flour with wonderful smoothness. It makes a dough which is easy to handle, with the light touch that insures a tender pie-crust. When you use this lard, you will be surprised at the new delicacy, the light, crisp flakiness your pie-crusts will have.

Why it is ideal for frying, too!

You can fry deliciously with this lard because you can heat it to an extremely high degree without its scorching or discoloring. See what a delicate brown crust immediately forms on your croquettes or potatoes, and keeps in all the fragrant, steaming aroma, all the delicious flavor.

Your food never gets grease-soaked. It cooks quickly, yet is well done all through. When your family tastes the croquettes you fry with this lard, they will think you have discovered some piquant new way to season them.

Get some of Swift's "Silverleaf" Brand Pure Lard today. Give your family delicious croquettes, pie-crusts that melt in their mouths. Hear them say that the things you cook are the best they ever ate.

Why is the Large Intestine Five Feet Long?

Modern Science Declares that if Nature Had Made the Colon Shorter, Half the Ills of Mankind Would Not Exist—How Medical Science Now Combats this Problem

A VERY remarkable book, "Colon Cleanliness," has recently been published by Martin's Method, Inc. Written by an authority, this book discusses—in a clear and fascinating narrative—what has been called "Nature's big mistake," the large intestine in man. Scientists now agree that poisons emanating from the large intestine are responsible, directly or indirectly, for many of the diseases to which mankind is heir. This book therefore possesses a tremendous interest to every man and woman. Incidentally it describes for the first time, in a popular way, an important invention which steps into the breach left by Nature and repairs some of the ills caused by the length of the large intestine. This invention is now being used in many hospitals and sanatoriums and by physicians in private practise.

Few people realize, this book points out, that the large intestine—coiled around in a small space in the abdomen—is usually at least five feet long. It is, in a sense, a long exhaust pipe for the body. The waste matter of our food reaches it in a semi-liquid state. The function of the large intestine is to extract the liquid from this matter, and to discharge the residue from the body. This long exhaust pipe works by a series of muscle-contractions along its five-foot length.

Five Feet Too Much for Lazy Muscles

But very often these muscles work improperly. They are, in plain words, lazy. They are so lazy that they are incapable of pushing along the waste matter a distance of five feet. The result is that the colon gets clogged. It then becomes a veritable bed of decomposing matter. Not merely millions, but billions of disease germs are generated in it. These are absorbed into the blood, and are carried to every part of the body, producing the condition, so much written about of late in medical journals, known as "auto-intoxication."

"Colon Cleanliness" tells, for the layman, exactly what happens to the various organs of the body when this condition occurs. It is an amazing narrative. Science, like a detective, has now traced many diseases to the clogged condition of the large intestine. Indirectly and directly the lazy large intestine causes more illness; kills more people; affects our health, our happiness, and our efficiency more vitally than all the other organs of the body put together.

The colon is, in a sense, a traitor to the rest of the body. By lying down on its work, it throws the whole splendid balance of the body "out of gear." It causes many of us to become seriously diseased, and the rest of us it puts into a poisoned half-alive condition. How often do we really feel up to par, really ourselves; with our brains keen and quick; our bodies tingling with vitality? So seldom that most of us talk about it, in surprise, when we feel "fit." Thanks to the lazy, large intestine, it is the unusual condition for us to be fully alive. The contrary, of course, should be the case.

How Nature Made the Mistake

Professor Elie Metchnikoff, in the great work in which he first pointed out the method and effects of auto-intoxication, has an interesting theory about the large intestine. Nature made it so long, he theorized, because originally man was an active wild animal. He was often in danger from other animals and would have to run long distances. For his safety it was necessary to have an organ in which waste matter could be stored. There was, however, little danger of clogging of the colon, because continuous natural exercise kept man's colon from being lazy. Its muscles functioned normally.

The large intestine which Nature fashioned was perfectly adapted to our former life. It is not adapted to modern life. Man is no longer a wild animal. He is easily the most inactive large animal on earth. He is a sitting animal. He almost never walks when he can ride. The first thing physicians tell him usually, when he is in a rundown condition, is to "get out in the air and exercise." But many of us are too busy to exercise; and still more of us, when we exercise, exercise the wrong muscles. The most important, the most vital muscles to exercise are those of the large intestine, for the simple reason that those muscles cause more trouble by their laziness than all the other lazy muscles put together.

Man's Inventive Power to the Rescue

"Colon Cleanliness," after describing minutely the problem of the large intestine—as discussed by many scientific authorities—deals with the invention that is now used to combat the laziness of the large intestine. This is a simple contrivance which does nothing else but exercise the large intestine. It wakes the large intestine to its job. It is called the Kolon Motor, and is a very simple device, since it can be operated by a child. Observations of its effect in hospitals and by private physicians show remarkable results. One merely puts the Kolon Motor on a door or wall, leans up against it and turns the handle for a few minutes. The face rotates with a scientific waving motion, which immediately stimulates the colon and causes proper functioning. Two or three minutes a day is all that is required.

In this simple fashion the colon muscles are exercised as much as they would be in taking a brisk walk of two or three miles. In medical circles it is recognized that this invention meets the problem of colon laziness in a logical, effective fashion. It is without the slightest harmful results, such as follow the taking of drugs, which usually only have the effect of making the large intestine more lazy.

This Book is Free

A copy of the book "Colon Cleanliness" can be secured gratis by any reader of this magazine. It is a book every man and woman should read carefully. While written in a popular style, it treats, with scientific precision, of a problem that affects the daily life of every human being. The shortcomings of the large intestine, the diseases that are caused by it, the manner in which these diseases are caused, and other fascinating aspects of this problem—are covered fully and clearly.

The book may be secured by addressing the publishers, Martin's Method, Inc., who are also the manufacturers of the Kolon Motor. They had this scientific treatise, "Colon Cleanliness," written by a physician, so that the public could clearly understand the importance of the many discoveries made of late in regard to uncleanliness in the large intestine. Only incidentally does the book treat of the Kolon Motor, in discussing the different efforts made by physicians to combat this great problem. The book, in other words, is a scientific work, and in asking for a copy one does not need to feel that the purchase of a Kolon Motor is involved. The makers are satisfied merely to get the scientific facts before the public. The book will be sent free to any one who asks for it. Address, Martin's Method, Inc., Dept. 1510, 105 East 30th St., New York.—

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE Seeadler, the German raider whose exploits off the South American coast some time ago may be remembered, and which disappeared from sight for several months, has at last been heard from. It appears that she left the Atlantic, and went to the Pacific, arriving there last May probably. During the next two months she sank three American schooners, but later she was stranded on Mopeha Island, the westerly island of the Society group. Her captain, three officers and two men, then embarked in a motor sloop. During the last week news has come of their capture. The remainder of her crew, according to the story, stayed on Mopeha Island till September 5, when a French schooner, the Lutece, arrived there. This vessel was captured by the remaining Germans, and after arming her they sailed away on her and have not since been heard of.

During the past week, the submarine sinkings slightly increased, fourteen British vessels over 1,600 tons and two under that tonnage having been sent to the bottom. In addition to the merchant ships the British man-of-war Drake, an old but useful cruiser of fourteen thousand one hundred tons, was torpedoed early Tuesday morning, October 2, off the Irish coast.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL reports from Copenhagen, Amsterdam and Berne give the news of a more or less serious mutiny in the German navy, which resulted in the execution of several of the participants. According to the dispatches the mutineers seized four vessels and killed the officers. One of the vessels was then steered by the mutineers toward the Swedish coast. She was, however, overtaken by German destroyers and forced to return, presumably to Kiel. Mutinies are also said to have taken place recently in the German army, but no details are given in the rather vague statements reaching us. The object of these demonstrations in both the army and navy is said to be to force a peace. Almost simultaneously with the news of these troubles in the German land and naval forces, it was revealed during a debate in the French Chamber of Deputies that there had been a mutiny of French troops last May and June.

THE Russian front, except in Bukowina, was without incident during the week. In Bukowina on Saturday, October 6, the Russians, supported by armored cars, made a thrust at the German positions in the village of Vaskautoy, northwest of the town of Sereth. This movement was successful and the village was captured, the Russians taking about 750 Austrians, besides some machine guns. Later, however, a counter-thrust drove the Russians back to their original positions.

It is still difficult to see clearly the interior situation in Russia. Kerensky has gone ahead, and, in spite of the prohibition of the Democratic Congress, has constituted a coalition cabinet, composed of members of all political parties, including representatives of the Constitutional Democrats. From semi-official statements made by Russian authorities, it appears probable that the Socialists of the Bolsheviki parties will oppose this cabinet and the provisional government. In addition to all its other troubles, the Russian government is threatened with a general railroad strike, which has actually begun on some of the important lines. The food supply is reported to be running short in all the northern parts of the country.

ON the western front the British offensive, begun on Thursday, October 4, was continued. This offensive was launched on the front extending from the Ypres Comines Canal (which runs southeast from Ypres to the Lys River) to a point northeast of Langemarck front about eight miles long. As a result of their offensive, the British made a penetration of the German positions on this front to a depth of about three-quarters of a mile at the maximum. The most important British gain was their securing possession of the northern end from Broodseinde, north of the low range of hills which runs in a general direction from northeast to southwest, to the east of Ypres. This capture places the railway from Ostend south to Lille within range of the British guns, but even the complete capture of this Ostend-Lille railway by the British would have little or no effect on the submarine bases, since the important lines of communication of Zeebrugge all run east and west. The fighting was very hard along the entire front, particularly to the east of Zonnebeke. All told, the British captured about 4,500 prisoners in this fight.

The next two or three days were occupied by the British in withstanding the German counter-attacks and in consolidating positions already won, but by Tuesday, October 9, they were ready for another forward move. This time the strength of their offensive was directed at those portions of the ridge already mentioned, which were still in the hands of the Germans, and their drive was to a very considerable extent successful. Poelcapalle was captured and progress was made north eastward from Broodsiende toward Passchendaele. Farther to the west, the French to the south of Dixmude made a forward move, and, crossing the flooded Broenbeke and Jansbeke rivers, captured the villages of St. Jean de Mangelare and Veldhoek, taking several hundred German prisoners in the process. This French advance was over a front of about a mile and a half, and the German positions were penetrated to the depth of about a mile. After this, to the end of the week, the Ypres sector was quiet owing to bad weather which prevented the Allies from attempting a further advance, or the Germans from counter-attacking in force.

until it either becomes changed into the very structure and composition of our bodies, or is excreted in one form or another. Which means, boiled down, that all the functions of our body, secretions and excretions, assimilation and disposal, are presided over and controlled by this law of metabolism.

This truth is manifested by the beautiful and wonderful way in which metabolism is able to rid our systems of poisons before they infest the organs and tissues, leading to auto-intoxication, and causing disease and death.

So much for the word metabolism, but when it comes to the matter of understanding the processes of metabolism, or how these changes are accomplished, no mortal, even the most eminent bacteriologist, can explain, nor can he tell how a single cell is produced, or how an atom of food is changed into muscle, bone or blood; and we can only exclaim with the psalmist that "man is fearfully and wonderfully made."

AND now we come to consider the fourth great word, "Opsonism," which heads this article. We stand face to face with a pure Greek word, which means "provisions." The word has very recently come into use in the scientific world. You will not find it in any but the most recently published dictionaries. Not only is opsonism a new word, but we are very ignorant as to the thing itself. The theory, as at present held by the eminent specialists who are studying it, is that there is present in the blood serum a substance that acts upon the bacteria, making them subject to the laws of our being, thus rendering harmless those bacteria which might produce disease, and in this way rendering the body, to a certain extent, immune. Such immunity is spoken of as opsonic immunity.

In this connection we must remember that there are two species, or varieties, of bacteria. We have the malevolent bacteria, which cause all the trouble and disease possible while in the body, and the benevolent bacteria, which, as far as possible, counteract the acts of the malevolent bacteria, thus accomplishing all the good they can in the way of protecting the body from distress, disease and death. These two classes of bacteria are constantly opposed to each other while in the body, and our state of health depends upon which class has the upper hand and is able to suppress the other. We are well, and should be strong, while the benevolent bacteria have the reins in hand; but we are miserable, morose and moribund when the malevolent bacteria are in the ascendancy. And yet, strange as it may seem, the theory is more and more gaining ground that the presence of the malevolent bacteria in the system is as necessary for the growth and development of the individual as that of the benevolent bacteria. The truly stanch and energetic individual is developed, physically, only when there is within his body this constant contest between the evil and good bacteria.

BOTH varieties of bacteria are to be found in every tissue and organ of the body, and it is our duty and privilege to see to it that the benevolent bacteria conquer and hold in abeyance the malevolent bacteria. It is the mission of the theory of opsonism to teach us the way to accomplish this most desirable end. If we look carefully into our subject we shall see that the mission of opsonism includes the other three words. Opsonism is really right living, and right living includes eugenics and metabolism, and excludes auto-intoxication, just as in the spiritual life love includes faith, trust and hope. Eugenics, metabolism and opsonism are constructive in their nature and function, whereas auto-intoxication is essentially and always destructive; and the object in associating auto-intoxication with the other three great words, which have the very opposite object in life, is to educate people up to the idea and fact that we are the arbiters of our own fortunes and futures more often than we think, and that while we are apt to blame fate and bad luck for many of the conditions of life in which we find ourselves from time to time, we are ourselves the offenders.

As a race we are constantly dying before our time, and very often leading forlorn lives, making those around us miserable, simply because we are disobeying the simple laws of life, and among other things poisoning ourselves with bacterial infections, thus causing this very condition of auto-intoxication.

OUR plea, first, last and all the time, is for the simple life, which is not necessarily a vegetarian diet, only it so happens that the vegetable kingdom supplies the best articles of diet, in our estimation. As we have said, add milk and eggs to the vegetables, and you have the perfect diet. Eliminate the food stimulants, for they create an artificial appetite, thus leading people to eat more than the system can appropriate and causing auto-intoxication with its deadly results.

[Dr. Vail's articles on Health Topics have been so warmly commended that we have requested him to add to the series, which was originally announced to consist of four articles. Those already published will be followed by articles on "How to Avoid Colds," "How to Avoid Headaches," "How to Avoid Rheumatism" and "How to Avoid Fevers." Any readers wishing to write to the author concerning any of the subjects discussed, should address him in care of the Christian Herald.]

Progress of the Second Bible Picture Study

A NUMBER of participants in the second Bible Picture Study have written to ask when the winners of the Second Bible Picture Study will be announced!

They point out that the last pictures appeared some time ago, and that it should be time for the publication of the decision of the Judges.

Well, it seems a long time since the appearance of the last pictures—but we haven't given ourselves one moment of rest since that day. The task of going over the sets of verses is tremendous, especially as we do not allow the possibility of error to occur. To guard against mistakes the sets must be checked and rechecked, and an elaborate system of records kept. This takes labor and time. But great as is the task it will soon be ended.

At the present moment the Judges have the lists of verses submitted for the sixty pictures, and we are momentarily expecting their decisions as to the best verses. When the Judges' designations have been given us we will then publish the list in the Christian Herald, so that each participant may check off and see how many verses they submitted were right and how many wrong.

A very large divergence of opinion was registered for each picture. Some participants may think that there were not more than one dozen different verses in all submitted for each picture. Well, for picture No. 17 there were 811 verses sent in! That was the largest number of different verses submitted for any picture. The smallest number of different verses, 105, was submitted for picture No. 25. The total number of different verses submitted for all sixty pictures was 15,318, so the average number for each picture was 256.

That is more than you thought, isn't it? We are doing our very best to hasten the decisions, and we shall all be glad to see the final announcement in the Herald. At the same time we want all our family of readers to know that we appreciate their interest in the Study, and we welcome every letter sent us concerning it. We are glad indeed to know that you are eager to hear about the result—it shows that the effort of the Christian Herald to make this Study of interest to all was very successful.

Defeat Through Drunkenness

International Sunday School Lesson for November 4

World's Temperance Lesson. I Kings 20:1-21

Progress in Our Temperance Campaign

By Rev. George D. Allison

OUR study of the reconstruction of Judah under Ezra and Nehemiah is interrupted by the International Lesson Committee requiring us to make a backward leap 400 years to the times of border warfare between Syria and Northern Israel. This is like turning from the reconstruction era after the Civil War to a single lesson on the French and Indian raids, only the difference of time there is but one century.

However, if we bear in mind the totally different situation and the much more primitive customs of Ahab's times we shall find today's lesson an exceedingly valuable one. It selects a great temperance chapter and gives us a war picture that is almost a parable for our modern war on drink.

The World-Old Scourge of War

The Old Testament is largely a war book. We in our war-cursed day look back across the centuries and realize that war is as old as the human race. We had hoped that the teachings of Jesus had so far prevailed that bloody international strife was a thing outworn. Now we see that we were too lightly optimistic. But we must not be cast down, we must not lose faith. Rather we must fight and sacrifice and pray without ceasing, to the end that this may be the last great war.

In Ahab's day war was a commonplace. In II Samuel 11:1 we read: "It came to pass at the time when kings go forth to battle." That simply means that springtime was the regular occasion for wholesale slaughter. Dean Hodges puts the ancient spirit thus: "What can we do better these fine fresh mornings than kill one another? The cause? They ask no cause. Is the war offensive or defensive? It matters not to them. Do they fight for principle or plunder? They do not greatly care; though they probably prefer plunder. They go to war for war's sake."

Now, war is abnormal. The whole world sees its horror and folly. Only the most conscientious conviction that liberty and humanity are at stake could possibly have drawn the United States of America into the arena. So, unlike Benhadad and a thousand more, our leaders go to war without thought of personal advantage, and our nation, unlike Syria, engages in a mighty struggle for no gain of land or gold, but that men may be free.

The Limits of Patience

Poor Ahab did his best to avoid a clash for which he was singularly unprepared. When an Oriental king submits to an invasion of his palace in addition to the spoiling of his wealth, he has reached the last depths of humiliation. When the insulting conqueror proposed a general pillage of the city, the limits of patience were passed. No defeat could be worse. The elders in council advised resistance, and all the people said unto him, "Hearken not nor consent." Ahab was justified in fighting.

Teach our boys and girls to be intelligent patriots and let them know why a Christian country fights.

America has been called a boastful nation. Even now we do not realize that we are engaged in a death grapple. It is for the men of religion to make and keep this nation sober and determined, and to lay low all illusions.

The Battle Array of Youth

The startling message of the prophet to Ahab was this: that he was to rely on the young servants of the provincial governors and not on the trained veterans of his guard. Every great war has been fought and won by the youth of the nations. "The army of Grant was an army of boys." Once more we see the young called to the colors, our brightest and best, to endure the hardships and master the difficulties that only eager, resolute youth can overcome.

How we must love them, pray for them, minister to them! for they are the hope of the Republic and of the Church of God.

Drink Brings Defeat

"But Benhadad was drinking." That is why his immense preparations went for naught. That is why his mighty army was dispersed and scattered by a few regiments. Of how many failures in war as well as in civil life might the same explanation be given! Drink won't mix with anything and bring success, not even with fighting. The pugilists know this, and the generals. Witness Pershing's warning to his men.

Alexander the Great might have unified his empire into a world force that endured. "But Alexander was drinking" and threw away his chance and his life at thirty-two.

The other day there was a sad train wreck on a great road. Track perfect, trains on time, signals set, towerman faithful. "But the engineer had been drinking!"

Every day a man loved of Christ, destined for power and usefulness, falls by the roadside of life. Good birth, fine training, college education, powerful friends. "But he had been drinking."

Our Temperance Warfare

The World-Old Scourge of Drink. War has slain its thousands, but drink its ten thousands. In the long stretches of peace its ravages have been continous. It has seduced the very preachers of righteousness, like Noah upon the threshold of his task. It has undermined justice, for the "mighty to drink wine" have ever been ready, as in the days of Isaiah, to "justify the wicked for a bribe." It has defiled the church and weakened the state.

Alcohol's Atrocities. The horrors of the invasion of Israel or of Belgium were largely due to drink. Only men crazed by alcohol could so some of the things that soldiers have done, we believe. But we forget that always, everywhere, in times of peace and plenty, hideous, foul, unspeakable things are being perpetrated under the influence of alcohol. The planned ruin and enslavement of Christian girls, the awful wreckage of homes and hearts, the sufferings of neglected and abused babyhood, the disgrace of proud and fine manhood into a vile caricature of indecency, these are but a few of alcohol's daily atrocities at our doors. And like war, alcohol is insatiable in demanding the young.

The Limits of Patience. We endured all too tamely, but now the fighting spirit of the church is aroused. Her forces have been marshaled in the Anti-Saloon League, in the numerous educational agencies, in the press, in the courts and factories and camps. We are in an earnest mood. The men who are defending liquor for profit must be shown up as traitors and vampires. Alcohol must go. It is blacklisted in the shop already. It is banned from the armies of American democracy. It is fast being outlawed by city and state.

Let Us Be on Our Guard. We must not boast as though this fight were won or the end in sight. Lloyd George said that England fights Germany, Austria and Drink; but he has not been able to eliminate the third enemy. Millions will say, "You can take our sons, you can take our money, but you shall not take our booze." Alcohol has his allies in the seats of the mighty. The prohibition of selling to the soldiers is being violated constantly. The trenches we have already captured are being undermined. Christian temperance soldiers, keep your armor on!

The Challenge of Today

"Who shall order the battle?" We need leaders, sober, trained, vigilant. Teachers who shall marshall the young men for the fray. Singers and prophets and reformers to lead them on. When Ahab asked for a leader, the answer was "Thou." That is the answer if you are inquiring, teacher in the school or the church, father or mother, Christian thinker. Do your part. Thou canst lead! Citizen or soldier, if you see a violation of the law, have the courage to report it, and to prepare and fight your case.

"I will deliver." "By whom?" You remember the answer of the prophet of victory to that. "By the young men." This temperance war will never be won by captains and generals any more than any other. It needs the rank and file. Victory will come, not to poet or seer or preacher, but to the consecrated, enlightened youth of the nation, sworn to cleanliness and power and truth. Sign the pledge, young men; it is your oath of allegiance in this warfare. Show your colors bravely, for the combat is man to man, and at close quarters oftentimes. "Catch your pal," for we need recruits.

No Quarter with Alcohol. "And they slew every one his man." We must each do our bit as in every line of endeavor. We must not try to compromise with this enemy. Drink must go. Half-way measures will never prevail, as Ahab found out afterward to his sorrow. Moderate drinking won't do. "Beer and light wines only" is a camouflage of the foe. They are drunk for the alcohol in them, the same as whisky or gin. We are out to fight for absolute prohibition, nationally enforced.

Press Our Advantage. We have the strategic position now. Science is our ally. Business is breaking off relations with the enemy. Food conservation works for us. The mighty call of patriotism in our day is for sober men, a clean nation, and a stainless flag.

The Question Box

CAN you tell me the names of good books for story-telling to children?
—W. M.

Answer. I would suggest the following: "How to Tell Stories to Children," Sara Cone Bryant; "For the Children's Hour," Bailly and Lewis; "Mother Stories," Maude Lindsay; "The Story Hour," Wiggin and Smith; "Little Animal Stories," and "Story-Telling Time," Frances Weld Danielson:

Question. We have a Junior Choir which furnishes the music through the summer months at the morning service. We are using the Hymnal. Can you recommend a book of songs suitable for children of from ten to fifteen years that could be used for special occasions or for Junior League and Sunday school work?—Mrs. H. B.

Answer. I would suggest the following: "Young People's Chorus, Nos. 1 and 2," Fuller and Meredith, "Primary and Junior Hymnal," Heidelberg Press; "Junior Hymns and Carols," Leyda & Burgener; "Cantatas for Junior Sunday School Choirs," published by Spokane Sunday School Supply Company, Spokane, Wash. Primary and Junior Songs," C. S. Summy Company, Chicago.

Question. How would you interest a class of live intermediate boys, ages thirteen to sixteen, in the lesson?—F. R.

Answer. I once had a class of boys of that age, and know some of the problems. (1) Before you can really interest such boys in the lesson, you must be a comrade with them I would have my boys to the house once a month. I gave them shorthand lessons free, as I understood stenography. We went on hikes to the Museum and other places. We were friends. (2) The lessons should be adapted to their age. The Graded Lessons for Intermediates, published by the larger and many of the smaller denominations should be tried. Biography is one of the features of these lessons. The heroic figures of Christ, Paul, David, are studied from the boy's angle. Missionary heroes are studied, and other great leaders of the church; and these lessons are planned to bring the life to Christ during this period, when Christian decisions are so often made. (3) Get each boy doing the thing he can do best.

A discouraged teacher once called on the mother of one of his boys to tell her he would have to give up the class, as he could do nothing with that boy. The mother replied, "I can't do anything with him either. Just look at my kitchen walls." And all about the walls the boy had drawn pictures of cats, dogs and other pets and animals. Next Sunday the teacher was there on time with pencil and pad He said to the boy, "Tom I understand you are an artist." The boy straightened up. "Well, perhaps I can draw a little." And that teacher saw that Tom was kept busy every Sunday, and having Tom he got the key boy.

The boy who loves history should look up the historical setting of the lesson and report it. The boy who likes to carve can model some object spoken of in the lesson.

Look far enough ahead to pick out these things for the boys to do. And it will help if you drop a card about the middle of the week, reminding him how much help he will be with that particular piece of work.

if need be, when at the critical moment God speaks, and his uplifted hand is stopped, and another sacrifice is provided; but Abraham fails not, and God can trust the man who holds nothing back from him.

THIS is a true story of two families in New England. It was given to me by a man who knew them both. First picture: A young man gave his heart to Christ, united with the church, became a Baptist deacon, married a minister's daughter, had a blessing at the table, erected a family altar, attended church regularly on Sunday, and was also in the prayer-meeting of the church at the midweek service.

Second picture: The young man in the second home is not a Christian. He married a brilliant woman, but one who did not believe in Christ. She criticized the Bible, she sneered at the Son of God, there was no prayer in the home, and the church was neglected.

In the first home the daughter became a beautiful Christian, the elder son a Christian lawyer, and the second son a minister of the Gospel.

In the second home the elder son became a brilliant lawyer; he was not a Christian and died a drunkard. The second son became a physician and died a sot. The only daughter became so vile that the story, as it is repeated today in New England, shocks every one.

How about your home? Let us be more definite still. How about your own life? Right living always pays. It pays for time, and it pays for eternity.

I make my appeal to fathers, and I make it because fathers should have an influence which should be almost boundless. For the sake of your own souls I plead with you to turn to Christ; for the sake of your children I make the appeal. Time will one day give place to eternity, and the question you will have to face in eternity will not be, "How much pleasure did you have in life?" "How much money did you make?" "How much fame did you win?" but "What did you do for your children?" and it would be a sad, sad thing to be obliged to say "I was busy here and there and let my children go."

"Seek ye the Lord while he may be found; call ye upon him while he is near."

The General All-Around Cleaner

Hello! Family Circle—Hello!

Just put your ear to the telephone and everybody "listen in."

This is the time of year when I feel like having a quiet chat with the members of the Christian Herald Family Circle. In these mellow October days there is something that invites the confidential mood, and besides, it is good to unburden one's mind occasionally. Hence, when I speak to the Circle, I feel that I can do so with absolute frankness, being in the "House of My Friends." It does not need any unusual effort of the imagination to conjure up before me that great array of faces—old and young—and every face animated with friendliness.

This year has been one of big events the world over. It has witnessed the expansion of the far-reaching Christian work of the Christian Herald Family Circle on a scale never before attained. And still bigger things are ahead, in which I look confidently for your continued cooperation.

To meet these larger needs, wider fields and greater demands, I feel the imperative need of increasing our audience. Our Family Circle, already a good-sized army, must become a still mightier force, not only in number, but in influence and spiritual and philanthropic outreach.

Now how to accomplish this: Well, I would ask each of my friends in the Family Circle to bring in at least one new member and thus the thing desired would be accomplished. I would suggest that for the next few weeks, our friends in the Circle should adopt the motto, "WIN ONE," and should strive to translate it into reality. Every new recruit who joins this army of practical Christianity and helpfulness will, after a little, thank the friend who brought him into the ranks, where he will find a great multitude of splendid Christian men and women, who have fought under the banner of Christ, against famine and sickness and suffering and heathen darkness in many different lands, and all in His Name.

There are many attractive features now appearing in the Christian Herald that you can tell your friends about. I can only name a few here:

HOWARD CHASE, a new novel by Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon, D.D., will be published exclusively in the Christian Herald, beginning in the late Fall.

Dr. Sheldon, the famous Kansas clergyman, has established for himself wide and growing popularity as an author through such gripping and enduring books as "In His Steps" and "Jesus Is Here." "Howard Chase" seems to us to surpass Dr. Sheldon's previous works in thrilling human interest and moral power. It is a church story but intensely human.

ADVENTURES IN NEIGHBORING, by Vera L. Connelly, editor, author and journalist, is a department soon to be started, in which women of the farms, in the city or in the small towns who have done things—things which have made life more worth while for themselves and for other women—will tell what they did and how they did it, for the benefit of those who feel that something should be done and do not know how to begin.

THE MILLENNIUM, WHAT, WHEN AND WHERE? is one of an additional series of articles on Prophecy, by America's Greatest Expositor, Prof. James M. Gray, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago. "The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy," Prof. Gray's first series of articles, which no doubt you read, brought forth such a number of inquiries that this additional series became a necessity.

VITAL HUMAN STORIES FROM RUSSIA, by Maynard Owen Williams. Mr. Williams, whose stories of the Orient have made clear so many things before but half understood, is now in Russia, right at the center of the turmoil and ferment of revolutionary plot and counterplot. Mr. Williams' articles will continue regularly in the Christian Herald.

THE GREATER UNITED STATES, by Frank G. Carpenter. In every Chautauqua Association and in nearly every town and village of the United States, Frank G. Carpenter is known as the man who can come back from some place and then tell about it so that you think you have been there. Already he has told you of steel and of cotton, of sugar, and of sulphur, of oil and of lumber, and he has only just made a beginning. The series will appear regularly.

DRAWINGS AND POEMS, by Robert Riggs and Margaret E. Sangster. This remarkable series of full-page Drawings with Poems reincarnate the day-dreams of Youth. The pen of Robert Riggs makes us young again and Miss Sangster's verses open the door to happy memories.

SPIRITUAL WORK IN THE CAMPS will be recorded by chaplains of all denominations in the service. Besides, there will be many letters of the deepest human and spiritual interest from our boys, whom we are now supplying with Testaments and Christian Heralds.

THE COMING OF PEACE AND AMERICA'S PART IN THE PEACE CONGRESS will be discussed by authoritative writers.

THE GREAT LEADERS OF THE AMERICAN CHURCHES will ask and state what the Church proposes to do to win back the spiritual influence it has lost, and which must be restored. There must be a religious rebirth and reconsecration in all the churches—a return to Christ and Calvary. Men like Drs. Jowett, Burrell, Remensnyder, Bishop Quayle, Prof. Rauschenbusch, Torrey, Chapman, and others, eminent in the spiritual field, will give their views on this vital subject.

THE GREAT EVANGELISTIC MOVEMENTS will be fully described and their results stated by men in the forefront of the work.

MR. HOOVER will give his views on the food conservation movement.

THE WEEKLY DOUBLE PAGE OF ILLUSTRATIONS, which is immensely popular, will show the progress of the world-war.

And now, a closing word: I want half-a-million more readers for the Christian Herald within the next two months. You can do this, and by so doing, raise the strength of the Christian Herald army very near to the figure which we have had our heart set upon all these years—a million strong! The one way to do it is to cut out the subjoined coupons and have each filled up with the name and address of a Trial Subscriber, and forward to us, with 25 cents for each new name. A little canvass of a few hours will work wonders for the accomplishment of our purpose.

And now, good friends, do "your bit" and help us up to the million mark.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

WERE you ever in a valley between high mountains, and did you ever watch the shadows melt before the twilight of early morning and the twilight yield to the full light of day? Did you ever watch the fugitive mists flee into the recesses of the canyon? Did you ever see great pines and rugged rocks flash into view in the light of the sun rising over the range, one minute the limits of the canyon only suggested by the faint outlines of its walls against the stars, then the rush of fast-gathering light driving back the purple haze from rocks and trees and trails and swirling torrents? Then the sunlight has touched the pinnacle of some highest peak, and the last lingering darkness has fled.

Have you ever been down in a deep canyon of despair? Look up to where God's light of love gleams on the pinnacles of promise, and you will see the entering in of the day. Throw open the windows of your soul on pinions of prayer toward the sunrise of God's love.

Mr. and Mrs. J. B. D. rejoice that a sister-in-law for whom they requested prayer has recovered her health, and that a church debt of nearly $5,000 was lifted in a few minutes.

J. C. T. based his prayer of faith on Phil. 4 : 6, and now praises God for the recovery of his wife, whose life hung on the balance for more than a week.

Mrs. L. J. L. asks the prayers of the League for her brother, a consecrated Christian, who has been for years a sufferer from asthma. She also praises God for the recovery of her husband, who, the doctors said, could not recover without an operation.

Miss E. E. H. thanks God for spiritual blessing, and asks the prayers of the League for bodily healing, also for the healing of another Christian woman, Mrs. T. R. B.

Mrs. T. T. L., a widow, two months ago asked the League to pray for the recovery of her daughter from a complication of diseases, and now she praises God for the nearly complete restoration of her child. She now asks prayer for a sister whose bodily infirmities are aggravated by pecuniary troubles, and for a sick young woman who has despaired of all human aid. Last of all, she asks divine aid and guidance for herself in a financial trouble.

E. E. and E. M. E. asked the League to join them in prayer that they might sell some land, and they praise God in a thank-offering of $100, to be devoted to the relief of the victims of the war.

J. R. H. joined with the League in praying for some insane patients. One woman, with whom she was closely associated, was cured. In this case the earthly means was in a great measure the personal kindness and human sympathy of J. R. H.

J. A. asked prayer for the restoration of the mind of her brother, and now praises God for his recovery and return to his home. She also asks prayer that God may keep her son and nephew, who are in the war, and that they may become Christians.

J. O. L. thanks God for an outpouring of the Spirit in a revival in Shenandoah County, Virginia, in which many souls were converted. He asks for the conversion of a young lady who is a leader in her community, that she may work for the church; and that God may take up his reign of peace on the earth.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Marion, Ala.; Lacy Spring, Va. (in the M. E. Church and U. B. Church); Verona, Wis. (in the Verona Baptist Church); Protection, Kan. (that many may be saved during revival); Emporium, Pa. (for a great work of grace during evangelistic meetings); Avondale, Cincinnati, Ohio (in the Trinity Church, Presbyterian and Methodist churches); Tallman, Mich. (for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon evangelistic meetings); A Reader (that the state of Ohio may go dry this election); Bellvale, N. Y. (for world-wide prohibition).

L. asks prayer that God will save a minister from the hands of a wicked mob, and that he may feel safe in going about doing the Master's service.

S. R. asks prayer that a minister's mind may be restored, Mrs. F. W. F., that son's mind may be restored, Mrs. K. P., that husband's mind may be restored, ten friends, for mental restoration for themselves, relatives or friends.

M. A. T. and L. T. ask prayer that an aged mother's sight may be restored; Mrs. R. A. D., that growths on husband's eyelids may be removed; Mrs. G. W. S., that daughter's sight may be restored; Mrs. T. H. W., that granddaughter's sight may be restored. Mrs. F. W. F., that a friend's sight may be restored, six friends, that their own sight may be strengthened.

Seven friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing.

Three friends ask prayer for special blessings for others.

Twenty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Five parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. W. J. F., that husband may be cured of the liquor habit; three friends ask prayer that friends may be cured of the liquor habit; A Reader, that son may be cured of the morphine habit; Mrs. E. F. E., to be cured of the drug habit.

A. C. asks prayer that son may be cured of the liquor habit; three wives ask prayer that husbands may be cured of the liquor habit. B. asks prayer that brother be saved from the liquor habit; and F. C. asks prayers that father may be cured of the liquor habit. Mrs. McC. asks prayer that husband and son may be cured of the tobacco habit; and Subscriber asks prayer that son may be cured of the drug habit.

Thirty-nine friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including R. M. R., that wife may pass safely through an operation; another, Mrs. L. L. S., that daughter may pass safely through an operation; another, Mrs. T. T. L., that sister may be restored to health without an operation; thirty-one friends, for healing of self.

Eleven parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; four wives, their husbands; thirty, other relatives and friends.

Thirty-four friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Fify-four friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including a Reader, who asks prayer for rain in West Texas; also H. A. T., who asks for rain around Vernon, Texas; and three friends who ask prayer that the war may end and peace may be restored.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

S. R., Muskogee, Okla.; Mrs. J. H., Rock Island, Ill.; Mrs. O. J. S., Pleasant, Iowa; A Loving Wife, Junction City, Kan.; Mrs. C. W., Nathalie, Va.; Mrs. H. P., Mason, Mich.; A Reader, Des Moines, Wash.; Miss S. J. G., Inavale, Neb.; L. B. H. S., Kents Hill, Me.; C. R. McK., Albuquerque, N. M.; C., Wilmington, Del.; Old Subscriber, Arcadia, Fla.; Mrs. S. I. S., Brockwayville, Pa.; Mrs. L. H. P., Upper Sandusky, Ohio; A. M., Nicholville, N. Y.; Mrs. C. B. McC., Artesia, N. M.; A Believer, Sunbury, Pa.; F. C., Greenup, Ill.; Mrs. A. P., Billings, Mo.; J. F. W., Harlem, Iowa; M. S. R., Cheriton, Va.; I. E. A., Senoria, Ga.; A Friend, Somers, Wis.; Mrs. J. M., Amsterdam, N. Y.; M. T. T., Cranogue, Del.; G. N. H., Chatterton Parkway, White Plains, N. Y.; L. B. H., Fort McCoy, Fla.; Mrs. M. F., Indianapolis, Ind.

African Lepers

REV. W. C. TERRIL, superintendent of the Inhambane, East Africa, Missionary District of the Methodist Episcopal Church, writes to the Christian Herald: "We appreciate very highly the continual help we receive as the result of your valuable and inspiring paper. You will be gratified to know that the first hospital of the Methodist Episcopal Church to be erected in Africa is now in the course of construction at Inhambane. The entire cost of the building will be $5,000. The building is of stone, which was quarried about twenty-five miles from the mission, brought by boat and landed on the shore and then carried to the place of building by the girls of the Hartzell School, which was their donation to this very essential enterprise of missionary endeavor. There are two stories and a veranda on each floor around the entire building ten feet wide. In all there are eight rooms, but with the large veranda space there will be a very large accommodation for many more patients. A leper camp and a tuberculosis camp must soon become realities. Dread disease is attacking the boys and girls of our schools. Wives of our native pastor-teachers have the marks of the leper written on them. The disease is spreading largely, because nothing is done to segregate those suffering with it.

Do Germs and Climate Cause Catarrh, Coughs and Colds?

R. L. ALSAKER, M.D.

By R. L. Alsaker, M.D.

Author of "Maintaining Health"

> Dear Doctor Alsaker: I have had catarrh since boyhood, and now my two children have it. During the fall and winter months my wife suffers with bad colds and the children frequently have a bad cough or sore throat.
> We have taken treatment from local physicians, using the medicines prescribed; we have used sprays and salves, but have derived no lasting benefit.
> We live well, eating and drinking whatever we want, but we do not dissipate in any way. Our family physician tells us that catarrh is caused by germs. Another doctor told us to blame it on the climate. If germs and the climate are the cause of these annoying troubles of the nose, throat and lungs, I don't see how any of them can be prevented, or even cured. What have you to say on the subject?
> J. B. W.

THIS family is no exception. The majority have catarrh, either chronic or acute. Catarrh of the head is annoying—and filthy. In the throat it causes irritating cough. When it is seated in the chest it is called bronchitis. If allowed to continue, the bronchitis becomes chronic and robs the individual of refreshing sleep, comfort and health. It weakens the lungs and paves the way for pneumonia and consumption.

Catarrh of the stomach and intestines points toward indigestion. So does catarrh of the liver, which produces various ills, such as jaundice and gall-stones, often ending in disagreeable and painful liver colic.

Catarrh sometimes causes earache, headache and other forms of pain, and it lays the foundation for many diseases.

This gentleman says that he lives well, but no one lives well who is ill. That is poor living. He can continue to eat what he likes, and grow healthy, if he will only learn how.

He thinks that germs and the climate are to blame, and as germs and climate are everywhere, we are helpless. It is a tragic fate, or would be, if it were true, for we can't escape the omnipresent germs and climate.

But neither germs nor the climate cause catarrh. Catarrh is due to improper eating—so are coughs and colds—and these conditions can be prevented and cured through right eating. And here is how it happens:

When people eat as they should not, they get indigestion, which fills the stomach and bowels with acid, gases and poisons; a part of these abnormal products are absorbed into the blood, which becomes very impure and the whole body gets acid. The blood tries to purify itself, and a lot of the waste attempts to escape by way of the mucous membrane. This irritates the mucous membrane, and the result is colds and catarrhs.

The right kind of food, properly eaten, makes pure blood and produces health, vigor and strength. The right kind of food builds a sound body, puts catarrh, pimples and blotches to flight, and paints roses on the cheeks.

Catarrh can be conquered quickly, surely and permanently. It has been done in thousands of cases. If you have catarrh you have eaten your way to it. You can cure yourself—you can eat your way out of catarrh into health, and while you are losing your catarrh you will rid yourself of other physical ills. The dirty tongue, that tired feeling, the bad taste in the mouth in the morning, the gas in the stomach and bowels, the headache, the rheumatism, and the creaky joints, and other aches, pains and disabilities will clear up and vanish. It is marvelous what proper eating will do, when other means fail. Don't take my word for it, but prove it in your own case and on your own person.

Catarrh is a luxury, not a necessity. Those who get it, can keep it indefinitely. They can also get rid of it and stay rid of it. Those who have catarrh should not complain about it, for they have the knowledge at hand that will show them how to get rid of catarrh and back to health.

Realizing the universal need of clearly defined instruction on the cause and cure of catarrh, coughs and colds, I have outlined in a small volume a plan of living that has proved successful in curing and preventing these troublesome conditions. My instructions are easy to understand and pleasant to follow.

The plan shows how to live so as to have health. It tells you in plain English the true cause of catarrh, and it gives you the true cure—a cure that works. There is nothing mysterious about it. You need not go to health resorts. You need not take drugs. It is simple, good, workable common sense that you can apply right in your home. The title of this new book is, "CURING CATARRH, COUGHS AND COLDS." Its price is one dollar, with ten cents additional to cover packing and postage. Its cost is considerably less than your doctor would charge for prescribing a treatment—less than your druggist would charge you for a patent "cure-all" that doesn't cure—less than it would cost you to lose a day's pay on account of sickness—less than the cost of an evening at the theatre. In fact this book is an investment that will pay dividends in health and happiness till the end of your days.

Send one dollar and ten cents to my publisher, Frank E. Morrison, Dept 71, 1133 Broadway, New York City, and get your copy. Follow my plan of treatment for one month; then if you are not entirely satisfied with the improvement in your health, return the book and your dollar will be refunded to you.

Remember this: If you want health you can have it. You have your choice of living right or living wrong. This book teaches you the truth and nothing but the truth. Do you want it?

PUBLISHER'S ANNOUNCEMENT: R. L. Alsaker, M. D., is an eminent authority on the subject discussed in the above article. His patients come from all corners of the globe and they learn from him how to get well and stay well. He has put the net result of his many years of professional experience with sick people into his writings and it is a real pleasure for me to recommend them, because I know from personal experience and observation that good results always follow an observance of his simple instructions. Don't risk another day's sickness; send $1.10 at once for "Curing Catarrh, Coughs, and Colds" and learn quickly how to prevent further sickness and get back to health and happiness. Money returned if you follow instructions for one month and are not entirely satisfied with your improvement in health. Frank E. Morrison, Publisher, Dept. 71, 1133 Broadway, New York. Advertisement.

A modern idea in dishwashing

If you want to save yourself the trouble of drying your dishes with a towel, try this: Use a tablespoonful of Gold Dust to a dishpan of water, wash all dishes of one kind together, scald with boiling water in wire dish drainer. Gold Dust so thoroughly dissolves the grease that the dishes will come out clean and bright.

Young People's Topics for November 4

Perseverance

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Eph. 6 : 10–20

THE world is always ready to take off its hat to the man who succeeds. Sometimes he is called lucky, but most times his success is merely the result of perseverance, of an impelling will that would not be denied. The world pays scant heed to his struggle, for struggle is more or less the common lot. It is only when he rises above the commonplace on the pinnacle of performance that the world gives him the victor's crown, prints his picture in all the papers, gives him a decoration, or names something after him. Success in the spiritual realm comes very much as does success elsewhere. We must have a goal, and we must struggle through hardship and opposition and misunderstanding and ridicule until the goal is ours. But we who fight for spiritual things fight not only in our own strength but in the strength of Him who is our leader and in whose Name we serve.

It would be well to paint before your mind's eye the image of yourself clad in the armor of God. Would a girdle of truth maintain its purity in touch with your person, or would it be soiled by lying lips or hidden purposes? Would a breastplate of righteousness rest undisturbed upon your breast, or would it be mocked by a life of make-believe holiness? Would your feet walk easily in the way of the Gospel of Peace, or are they found more often in ways of strife and contention and struggle for worldly advantage? Is your shield of faith firm against the darts of the wicked, or is it full of holes of half-belief and of doubtful questioning? And finally, can you wear the helmet of salvation, or is your life still unredeemed from its sins, unwashed in the blood of Calvary? Can you wield the sword of the Spirit, or is the Word of God still a strange tongue to you? Can you quote the latest movie advertisements more surely than the Scriptures? Paul urges us to put on the full armor, but the armor can only be carried by the soldier who is ready, and he tells us how to get ready, in the 18th verse, by "praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints." Spiritual success would come first, therefore, through perseverance and prayer, for only thus can we accumulate the store of spiritual strength which God has in reserve for us. With this power it will be easier to persevere toward those goals which his Spirit may set before us.

Leavening the Foreign Avalanche

Epworth League Topic. Isa. 60 : 3, 5, 10; Acts 1 : 8; Matt. 13 : 33

THIS topic was quite fully discussed in connection with a similar topic, "Home Mission Work Among Immigrants," in this column in the September 19 number of the Christian Herald. The foreign avalanche has now greatly diminished because of the war; in fact it can now hardly be called an avalanche. In the years just before the war, foreigners came to our shores in greater numbers than we were prepared to handle. Their need for instruction in American ideals and in our common language exceeded the facilities which the churches had been able to create. It exceeded even the facilities which far-sighted school boards had provided in night schools in many places. Now, with the proportion of foreign born in our population remaining stationary—a great many of the sons being taken into our army, where they will be taught English and the fundamental principles of American democracy—the total problem is much simplified, and the churches will fail utterly in their duty to God and their country if they do not prepare for a country-wide attack upon the problem of the unassimilated immigrant. But let us not forget that the immigrant must find God in this nation. Liberty without God is the jest of kings, and has been the pitfall of peoples in years past.

Questions and Answers

M. R., Chattanooga, Tenn. What is meant by the phrase, "hardened his heart," which is found repeatedly in the Scriptures? If God does harden the hearts of men, how are they then responsible?

There has been much discussion upon this point, and it is doubtless a difficulty to many in the way of a clear understanding of the Bible. The best authorities, however, unite in a very simple explanation. It is this: that in the course of a long and persistent career of sin, there comes a time when, God's restraining Spirit being withdrawn, the sinner no longer feels the slightest compunction at continuing in his wickedness; conscience ceases to admonish him of error or danger, and the man becomes a hopeless moral incorrigible, indifferent alike to the effect of his own course upon himself or others. He ceases to have any desire to do better and lives to gratify the desire of the moment, heedless of the future. Some have called this a condition of "judicial blindness," or incapacity to distinguish good from evil.

Mrs. A. O., Meridian, Ohio. Josiah and Jeremiah were contemporaries, and the prophet was a strong ally—if not the most important one—of the king in carrying into effect his reforms in the nation's religious worship, and in suppressing idolatry. One commentator remarks on this subject: "So important was this reformation that it forms an epoch whence Jeremiah dates many of his prophecies" (Jer. 25 : 3, 11, 29, etc.). Josiah is represented as consulting other prophets at times, and particular mention is made of his consultation with Huldah, a prophetess, of whom he inquired concerning the denunciations contained in the newly found "Book of the Law." The reason why he did so, it has been suggested, was that she lived in Jerusalem, whereas Jeremiah dwelt in Anathoth. It was a matter of convenience and the king regarded the case as urgent.

G. M. W., Fairmont, Minn. The old Gospel and the plan of salvation, as Jesus himself proclaimed it and as it was followed in the days of the apostolic church, has never been changed, although many of our modern preachers would seem to have forgotten it. Repentance, confession of sin, baptism and open acknowledgment and acceptance of Jesus Christ as Saviour, followed by works meet for repentance—these steps are not now sufficiently emphasized, and we listen instead to a man-made Gospel, which has no saving power and leads nowhere. We need a return to the old Gospel—the only remedy that meets the spiritual need of men today.

Mrs. E. O. H., Selma, Calif., and Reader, Wisconsin. The Book tells of great sinners who came back to grace and were saved. Could any sin be greater than was David's? (II Sam. 11), and yet he was forgiven; Peter denied his Lord and Master (Matt. 26 : 69) and yet by repentance and faith came back into the fold; Paul was a grievous sinner; Mary Magdalene had fallen deeply; the thief on the cross was a murderer, and yet for them all Jesus had only love, compassion and assurance of forgiveness and full pardon. We must never forget that Christ came to save sinners; that the Son of Man is come to save that which was lost (Matt. 18 : 11), and that Christ has a peculiar mission toward those who need him. "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick" (Matt. 9 : 12). Hence your sin is in no wise a stumbling-block. "Though your sins be scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool" (Isa. 1 : 18).

Mrs. C. D. B., Phœnix, Ariz. 1. Israel, according to Jeremiah, was in captivity seventy years (Jer. 25 : 12; 29 : 10). 2. The first great event in the return from captivity was the decree of Cyrus in consequence of which 42,360 Jews of Babylon returned, together with 7,000 slaves and cattle. The great mass of the Jews, however, remained in the lands to which they had been scattered.

A. J. K., Philadelphia, Pa. 1. We do not understand that the ceremonial law contained only things that were a shadow of things to come. It contained much of necessary esthetic, sanitary and moral value. 2. Isa. 66 : 17 refers to those who practice the various idolatries, such as requiring a garden to sacrifice there, possibly before an especial tree, eating mice (legally unclean animals), and swine's flesh. The Pharisees and all formalists are included in the same condemnation, described in language taken from the idolatries prevalent in Isaiah's time. 3. There is no text that distinctly authorizes the observance of Sunday in the place of Saturday. The change was made in celebration of Christ's rising from the dead. At the first great Church Council, when the question was discussed, it was decided that only four observances should be required of them (Acts 15). The observance of the Jewish Sabbath was not one of them. The writings of the early Fathers show that very early in the Christian era, if not in apostolic times, the first day of the week was uniformly the day of religious meeting and abstinence from secular labor, thus celebrating the new creation as the Jewish Sabbath celebrated the old.

J. H. M., Denver, Colo., and W. D., Jamestown, Pa. Under the ancient Jewish economy, tithing was regulated by a code of laws which were amplified and made still more complex by the rabbins; but under Christianity the supreme law of love has been substituted, and is applicable to the tithing problem quite as well as to others. We are to give according as God has "prospered us," and from a generous and loving heart. One who wishes to tithe his estate should reckon on the increase in value, or number, or whatever form his available assets may assume, excluding, of course, the necessary expenses of conducting his business. As to household expenses, these are elastic, and one's domestic and personal expenditures are liable to increase with every augmentation of income, such increase frequently being one of extravagance rather than of necessity. It is quite conceivable that the whole income might be thus swallowed up. But if we act conscientiously we will not "rob God" by multiplying our expenditures until nothing is left for his work. "The liberal soul shall be made fat," and this especially applies to the character of our gifts to God's work. While we are not to devote to that work money which we may rightfully owe to our creditors, we can exercise self-denial in many things, so that our tithable "increase" (or, if no increase, then our surplus over and above all proper expenses) may be such as to assure a liberal gift to the cause of religion.

R. A. H., Coatesville, Pa. The passages you mention are not contradictory. In Mark 10 : 6–9 Christ reviews the historical facts that God from the beginning made man and woman, and blessed the union of the two in marriage, saying among other things that the union between man and wife is closer and stronger than any other on earth. In recognition of the blessedness of this relation and its sacredness, he likens his relation to his church to the relation of a bridegroom to his bride (Matt. 9 : 15; 25 : 11; John 3 : 29). But, like all earthly relations, the marriage relation must needs suffer under peculiar tribulations, as it did during the times immediately referred to in Matt. 24 : 19. In times of great tribulations, hunger, famine and upheaval, children and their mothers are likely to be especially harmed. This is what the account in Matthew means, that mothers and infants will be afflicted—not that there should not be mothers and infants.

True Blue Bible Class, Delaware Water Gap, Pa., and Rev. J. K. S., Hurley, N. M. We presume you mean defense by force. If a man were accused of murder, or any capital offense, he could find justification for defending himself in court in the example of Paul, Peter, Stephen, etc., who defended themselves by speeches. Paul also availed himself of the provisions of the law of citizenship to save himself from injustice (see Acts 22 : 25). We believe that if Paul had been attacked by robbers when he was carrying to Jerusalem the money subscribed by the Christians for the relief of the poor, he would not have given up the money without a fight. But direct justification for taking up arms in self-defense is not indicated, and perhaps none was needed. It may have been regarded as the natural course. We do not think that Christ's command "that ye resist not evil" (Matt. 5 : 39) applies to self-defense so much as to retaliation.

H. S., Oak Harbor, Ohio. 1. All the commandments are correlated. The first three, refer mainly to our duty toward God, and the last seven, to our duty to our fellow man. We cannot love God without also loving our neighbor, and we cannot truly love our neighbor without also loving God. Hence, one without the other is useless. 2. No one can say what our present times portend. We must keep on watching and praying, leaving all the rest to God.

Mrs. W. F. I., Corona, N. M. Your interesting letter has been referred to Professor Gray.

F. L. W., Claremont, N. H. "I was glad to see you suggested a day, or days, to be set apart for prayer on account of this dreadful war. I hope you will keep on suggesting it, and that blind eyes may be opened and wicked hearts cleansed from selfishness, prejudice and hate. We have forgotten that the Bible says, "The Lord maketh wars to cease," but have been relying on our mind, might and strength, the Pope, the President, submarines, flying machines, and everything else but God, it seems to me."

A. H. S., Wilkes-Barre, Pa. In Ps. 116 : 13, from the context, we note that the psalmist is using one of his peculiar rhetorical effects and in asking a question presages the answer. Thus he asks what he is to render the Lord as a thank-offering for His many benefits, and answers that he will accept the cup of salvation freely offered. "Cup" or "portion," a designation of a measure, denotes an amount or volume. The psalmist accepts the Lord's liberality of abundant salvation.

W. B. E., Manley, Neb., takes issue with the statement that many a boy in blue returned from the swamps of the South a confirmed drunkard, in an article in a recent issue of this paper, and declares such a statement unfounded. W. B. E. writes: "I was a soldier three years in the Civil War and I know what I am saying. I was in the Western Army and East, also, and I saw many of the boys, and am sure I saw very little drunkenness. No, our Boys in Blue were better poised. We had a chaplain in our regiment most of the time. We were just like a band of brothers. I am now past seventy years and I have still my first drop of whisky to touch or drink, and never played a game of cards while in the army. I am sure also there were many more who did not play cards."

The Church and the War

Its Responsibility and Its Failure—A Trumpet Call for Organization and a Broader Vision

FIVE years ago a plan was formed whereby the leaders of religious thought in the United States should hold a Religious Congress in Pittsburg, to devise some means by which organized religion might influence the government of nations. The war has changed all phases of life, and the Religious Congress, which has just ended a four-day session, found its program diverted almost entirely to the war, and to the original purpose was added the problem how the church may meet the needs after the war and become a factor in the prevention of future cataclysms.

From the several Sub-Commissions which gave preliminary labor to the preparation of reports, there came a bulk of material that was gradually crystallized into conclusions and recommendations. Among the subjects discussed were the following: Principles and Methods of Organization; Community Evangelism; World Evangelism; Religious Education; Social Service; Church Comity; International Justice and Good Will; Religious Publicity.

Among the speakers were Dr. J. A. MacDonald of Toronto, Bishop F. J. McConnell of Denver, Dr. Robert E. Speer, chairman of the General War-time Commission of the Churches; Daniel A. Poling, Dr. Frederick Lynch, Dr. James E. Freeman of Minneapolis and others. There was a large representation of ministers and laymen from communities adjacent to military camps and stations, and the problems relating to the welfare of soldiers and sailors, and of young women in such communities, were thoroughly discussed.

MORE than 500 delegates attended the Congress. Fred B. Smith of New York, as chairman of the Commission, presided at the sessions. He gave as his reason for the Congress: "The great, great question that is asked of the church today is whether the Christian religion is big enough to influence throne rooms, houses of parliament and legislative bodies. Any religion which does not have some effect on these centers of government is going to be put on a side street, down some blind alley.

"The war is going to make the sphere of religion broader than before. If I thought that the saving of my soul was all that religion had to do, I'd stop going to church. But the church has a bigger field, and that is one of the reasons why this Congress has been called together. When all Europe was precipitated into the chaos of war, organized religion was helpless. It had no channel through which it could express itself. It is our business to find some way by which such a war as this cannot happen again without organized religion being able to do something, if only to make a decent protest. We are concentrating on the war, because the war is going to change the whole face of the religious map. Any preacher or religious thinker who thinks he may proceed after the war with the same sermons and the same aims as twelve months ago, must be blind."

Rev. Dr. Robert E. Speer, chairman of the War-time Commission of the Churches, made one of the notable addresses of the Congress. He said, in part: "Not in many a day have the churches been drawn together in faith and service as today. A common spirit of resolve and duty has touched them all. Close as we have been drawn together, we must be drawn closer yet. Only the Christian spirit can effect this unity. It must be done by our recognition of the absolute law of unselfishness and sacrifice. The task is too big to allow any room for jealousy, criticism or distrust. We need among the churches and throughout the nation a spirit of absolute brotherly faith. The processes of cooperation and united effort are demanded by the most vital needs of the hour. The church, made up of its many forces, is alone able to do the work which must be done. The church must be looked to today to save, to enlarge and to release the moral values and resources of the nation, to keep our moral sense and perspective clear, to preserve the purity and aim of the nation, to defend it from sordidness, from the spirit of vengeance or recompense. There are enthusiasms which the hour can kindle to a great heat, but which have yet their time of testing to meet. When the day of tension comes, and the enthusiasms of the hour have died down, and the black shadows fall across the land, then the nation will realize its need of the work which only the church can do in producing the calm loyalty that abides and the steadfastness that wears down and outlasts death.

John R. Mott, General Secretary of the International Committee, Y. M. C. A.

"The supreme business of the church is to recover and to mediate to men the risen and living Christ. We need a clear and unflinching conviction as to the world's supreme need of him and his supreme adequacy to the world—a conviction clear and distinct to our thought today, and uttered and proved by the moral life and energy of the church, its love, its purity and its justice, in this hour of its opportunity and of the world's need."

Dr. John R. Mott made a plea for Russia, "the most plastic of all warring nations. Russia is at once participating in the greatest war of history, the greatest political revolution of history, the greatest of all social and industrial revolutions and the greatest religious revolution since the Protestant Reformation. The first of these great influences alone is testing America. Russia has idealism and courage perhaps not equaled in the world; she will emerge. She presents an unprecedented opportunity for the highest Christian influences in this critical time."

Dr. James E. Freeman, St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal Church, Minneapolis, spoke for church efficiency:

"While Titanic forces in the state and industry are coming together for the purposes of cooperation and mutual preservation, what is the great Christian Church doing to render its enterprises more efficient through mobilization? Are we to go on without the mobilization of our forces, scattering our fire and wasting our energies, while the mighty enemy triumphs over the hearts and wills of men?

"Nothing is more tragic than the failure of the great Christian Church of every name to seize opportunities as they come, and by concentrated effort to utilize them for the salvation of men. The world today is literally staggering and bewildered in its vain search for leadership and a sustaining religious conviction, and, confronted with this condition, we dare not be mere purveyors of denominational wares and nostrums. Let there be variety of form, but let there be unfailing unity in those mighty fundamentals that underlie and render valid all forms. Mobilize, mobilize!—this is the clear clarion call of the hour, and woe betide the church if it fails to meet it!"

Dr. Frank Mason North, President of the Federal Council of Churches, said: "The pressure of the present time is bringing the denominations into closer cooperation than ever before. The willingness with which they are subordinating the denominational differences especially in respect to specific religious doctrines, in a common drive to give religion to the men in the field, gives church leaders the hope that denominational lines will ultimately become mere lines of historical demarcation."

The Rev. Morton C. Pearson of Indianapolis advocated a religious chamber of commerce. "We should pull together with the business men and operate our churches on a business basis with our efforts focused on a definite plan. The great trouble with the church today is that our ministers devote too much time to denominationalism, forgetting the chief object of the church. Work with your business men and you will find that the benefits will be many."

CHURCH comity was a new term and a new subject taken up by the congress. By "comity" is meant the cooperation between all churches. A committee of representatives of all churches in any given city will decide whether a church may be erected anywhere, and no church may be removed without the consent of the committee.

Church unity was explained further by the Rev. B. S. Winchester of New Haven, Conn., who said: "If we are to have a kind of democracy safe for the world, we must have a type of religious education that will give men self-mastery, mastery of ambition and of purpose. The present world situation challenges the attention of all Christians to the task of religious education. Whatever has been accomplished through the organized activities of the Christian Church, their combined influence has not availed to avert the catastrophe of war. Science and the remarkable development of educational systems have served but to refine and intensify the horrors of war. While undoubtedly the first duty of all right-thinking people is to make the world safe for democracy, the next duty, no less urgent, is to 'make democracy safe for the world.' For this, education affords no guarantee, unless it be transfused and surcharged with religion."

Rev. Francis J. McConnell of Denver, Methodist Bishop, struck the keynote of the Congress in these words:

"We shall have to broaden our conception of Christian service. With the sight of millions of men marching to death for convictions dear to them, it will be no longer permissible for us to insist upon artificial or trifling tests as signs of the Christian spirit. It is the function of the Church today to make men conscious of the spirit which possesses them, to bring out in the clear light the Christ who is working within them. All arbitrary standards of salvation must be forever swept to one side, if we are really to move masses of men. The one test of democratic righteousness is just the willingness to do the will of God. The church must ask herself if she stands as she should for the fundamental human interests. She must be willing to make any modifications in her doctrines or practice which seem to stand in the way of fundamental human rights. Moreover, the Church must stand for the Christianization of international relationships. It must take the whole field of diplomacy out of the realm of trickery and bring it up to the light of publicity. It must take the question of human brotherhood seriously."

Mr. Hicks, of the Sub-Commissions on World Evangelism, recommended a department of mission education. "If the church would make its efforts toward world evangelization successful, it must go in for a continuous, constructive program of mission education. At the close of the war, the whole Mohammedan world will be open to Christianity. Can the local church federation interpret to its community the vital importance of such an opportunity, the necessity for seizing it? The educated classes of China are now accessible to the workers of Christianity, as they have not been in the past. They are asking us to give them knowledge of Christ. They want a Christian foundation for their civilization and their government. Yet the rank and file of the churches is indifferent."

Some of the declarations of the sub-commissions are important. Regarding religious publicity, it is declared that there is "no hocus-pocus method whereby the church may be brought to the favorable attention of the people. The same painstaking efforts are required in religious publicity that are demanded in commercial advertising. But let us beware of the unintelligent enthusiasm of some ministers and some advertising men who know so little practically of the church and of advertising that they think impossible things can be done merely by buying space and filling it with words."

Under the subject of Community Evangelism, it is declared that "there is a crisis at hand and a call that is well-nigh tragic, that demands of each and every one of us and a fearless and pronounced expression of our great faith."

The great duty of world evangelism is strongly urged, and also the unity of the churches in war-time, local, inter-church work. "The church, to be a real force for good, must be not only united in faith, but must be working as a unit. A divided church will have no influence in either army or navy."

The whole matter as presented to the Congress may be summarized as follows: In the promotion of world evangelism, the local federation should adopt and use whatever cooperative methods will help to fulfil the following primary objectives: Improve the missionary organizations of the churches; foster missionary education; increase the volume of missionary intercession; promote giving according to New Testament principles; organize and direct missionary service in and near the community; enlist and provide for the training of recruits for missionary life service, and, that these may become a reality, to train leaders competent to inspire and guide the entire membership of the churches in ever-expanding effort to extend and establish Christianity in the whole world.

"The purpose of this commission," the report adds, "is to promote the establishment of a Christian World Order. Every church should share in this task. Only the cooperation of tens of thousands of churches of all communions, and of millions of intelligent Christians, will be able to Christianize America's international relations and thus do their part in the great world enterprise."

Adventures in Neighboring

A Plan for the Exchange of Experiences Between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them Into Practice

By VERA L. CONNOLLY

"NEIGHBORING"! Is there a kindlier word in our language? Those of us who are living, or have ever lived, in the country will answer: "No!" For we understand, as no native of the crowded cities possibly can, what real neighboring is, and what it can mean to a lonely woman isolated on a farm or living in a strange town. The pat of gift-butter handed over the gate, the loaned magazine or dress pattern, the hearty and unexpected invitation, the chat in the road over a friend's buggy-wheels—these have turned the tide of many a woman's life, and, possibly, of yours or mine.

Is there one among us all who cannot remember days—hard, disheartening days—when a neighbor's loving act or presence came like a benediction, filling our hearts and moving us to tears as he who had "fallen among thieves" must have been moved when the Good Samaritan bent over him? Our "thieves," perhaps, were not of the kind that run away on two feet, but were rather of the deadlier sort: discouragement, mayhap, or loneliness, or failure, or sorrow, or disgrace, or want. Yet our help came to us as it came to him of old through a great-hearted "neighbor": a neighbor who chanced to be driving by, and who did not "pass by on the other side."

We have all known such hours—all had such neighborly love showered upon us! And we, in our turn, have tried to pass this love on to other lonely individuals.

And yet, grateful as we are today for every such personal kindness shown to us, and for every chance we have had to show it to some one else, most of us perceive that with the years we have grown somewhat out of this personal sense of "neighboring" into a bigger, broader, nobler concept, which not only includes the woman next door, not only those nearest and dearest to us, but takes in every one—the whole town or community.

IN looking back, we probably cannot tell just when or how we first began to look beyond the next farm, or the next block, or our own little circle of friends, to whosoever, whether strangers or acquaintances, children or grown-ups, societies or institutions, seemed most to need our loving and neighborly assistance.

And yet I am sure that, even if we have forgotten just in what way the vision first came to us, it has lost none of its thrill. For of all the adventures in the world, there are none so exhilarating as those we experience when we set out to "mother" the community in which we live; to suffer and rejoice with it; to help right its wrongs and meet its needs; to glory in its successes and proudly share in its triumphs.

For the benefit, therefore, of those of us who are just beginning to emerge from personal into community neighboring; who are taking the first uncertain steps; who have about concluded, this winter, to help trim the Community Christmas Tree (even if that basket of goodies doesn't get over to the next house)—for the joy and inspiration of all unselfish rural women everywhere, this department is being thrown open.

It is to consist entirely of testimonies from women living in small towns and on farms: women who have high community ideals and are putting them into practice. And all the subscribers and friends of subscribers of the Christian Herald are invited to contribute to it.

IT is my hope that your letters will include accounts of every sort of community activity: from the founding of art, literary, music, or dramatic clubs for the young folks, to the efforts of some woman or women to improve the sanitation, roads, general appearance, morals or amusements of the home town or community. I am interested in every kind of community festivity: pageants, Christmas trees, garden-contests, concerts to develop home talent, parties or lectures held in the schoolhouse auditorium, all-church picnics, outdoor plays, field days—anything that has ever united the hearts and interests of the whole countryside, or even a goodly proportion of it, for the time being. Almost every day of your lives, you women are doing something toward keeping your home town or community progressive and wholesome and interesting.

So please sit down now, and write me the facts about your most inspiring "Adventure in Neighboring"; even if it was only how you made peace between two neighbors who had been enemies for years; or how you fought for prohibition; or how you helped to buy and plant trees in your town; or provided the young girls of the neighborhood with a wholesome substitute for unsafe buggy-rides; or how you helped to found a little free library. These are only suggestions: not topics to be followed necessarily. Your experience may lie along entirely different lines.

I WANT facts, of course: facts which will encourage other rural women who may now be grappling with the very problems you have solved. This department is not to be an exchange of suggestions, but of actual experiences. Write me, in care of the Christian Herald.

Only the letters containing the most valuable and stimulating facts, briefly stated, can be given space. But all will be welcome and appreciated. For every letter I publish (wholly or in part), fifty cents will be paid on publication. I cannot acknowledge the receipt of letters, nor can I return the unavailable ones. Every letter will be carefully examined, then published in its turn, or destroyed.

PLEASE keep your accounts clear, brief, and full of practical details: stating costs, methods, difficulties overcome, etc. Whenever possible, kindly allow me to publish your full name and address. Unless you do allow this, I shall use only your initials and no address. So, if you prefer, no one needs to know who you are or where you live. Be sure, however, that your full name and address are somewhere on the letter.

You mustn't lose interest if your first letter does not appear at once. It may appear later on. Or it may have been duplicated (in subject matter) by so many as to be unavailable that week. So keep sending more. This Department will appear weekly. As it grows in size, I hope to be able to pay more per letter. Its growth will depend on your interest in it.

THE letter published below—a beautiful and stimulating one which came into this office recently and led us to believe that such accounts as this should be read by every one—illustrates the sort of mutual helpfulness we have in mind.

"DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: Perhaps the following will be of value to some community facing the problem of a band of bad but young boys, such as we were here two years ago.

"The members of the 'gang,' ranging in ages from six to sixteen years, had fallen into habits of theft and destructiveness, which seemed to baffle all efforts to curb them. The reform school seemed to be the only resort, when the

A Day in Camp

By
LOUIS E. ORCUTT

CLEAR through the mist of early morning rings out the call, reveille. It echoes from regiment to regiment throughout the great division camp. In answer to the call come thousands of khaki-clad figures from the round brown tents and great board barracks, and before the sun is well upon his day's journey, the long brown lines are passing through the mess tents or past the cook-shacks. By the time the average business man is turning his key in his place of toil, assembly or some other call has sounded and all these soldiers-in-the-making are busy at some task connected with the great enterprise upon which the nation has entered in the name of liberty and democracy.

But every man is not always busy throughout the day. Sometimes part of a company may be detailed to a certain work while the rest remains in camp with no specific duties scheduled. Always in every regiment there are some men too sick to drill, yet still not sick enough to go to the hospital, nor quite enough "under the weather" to stay in their bunks. Between morning drill and afternoon drill there is an interval of time given up in part to mess and in part to games or rest. After the afternoon drill comes mess again, and then, in the evening, when no duties press and darkness gathers and the hours stretch out in weary lengths toward the sounding of the last call of the day, the bugles blowing "taps," lights out, and sleep.

Any one who knows men need not be told that these hours for which no military duty calls will be spent in doing something. It may be something worth doing, or something which they would not particularly care to write home about, for mothers and sweethearts, and even sisters, have old-fashioned notions. In other wars little has been done to give the men an opportunity for clean recreation except what could be done by regimental chaplains or by an occasional big-hearted civilian near the camp. The American Y. M. C. A. has jumped into this wide-open breach in camp life and has filled it in a way which has made every man in service a fast friend of the organization. It is probable, however, that few folks at home know fully what this work of the Y. M. C. A. means to the nation, to the loved ones whose prayers go up daily for the saving of their boys from the multiplied dangers of a great camp, and to the boys themselves.

An outdoor service. Madame Schumann-Heink singing to 3,000 men in khaki

THE writer spent the whole of a rare October day at one of the great camps where men are being trained for the fighting front in France. He reached camp about the middle of the morning and went with the chief secretary of the camp from tent to tent. He did not stay with the secretary all the time, for he wanted to talk with the men and find out what they thought about it.

From every man came the same hearty response expressed in various ways, but all assuring the writer that the Y. M. C. A. was the brightest thing in the camp and that every man appreciated in full its comforts, conveniences and wholesome influences. One man to whom the writer had just sold a couple of stamps while he was substituting for one of the tent's secretaries was asked what he thought of the Association. He said, "Honest, I didn't suppose anybody could have cared as much for us fellows. You just bet your life when I get out of the army and get to earning money again, I'm going to make a big subscription every year to the Y. M. C. A."

A captain said that the Y. M. C. A. was doing more practical work for the men than any other organization working to help them, although, he said, some of the organizations would not reach their full opportunity for service or be fully appreciated until the men had been in action. Just now, the Y. M. C. A. meets their need and fills it to overflowing.

In this big division camp each regiment, except those which are largely Catholic, has its Y. M. C. A. tent. For the Catholic men the Knights of Columbus have a similar work.

Each tent has a staff of four secretaries, one man in general charge, one man to look after the distinctly religious work, another to see that the men are given every opportunity for recreation, and still another who is, technically, the counter man. Each of the four takes his turn at the counter at one end of the tent, and it is over the counter that the contact is made with the men of the different companies and comradeship established between them and the secretaries. This comradeship is deepened at mess when the secretaries mess with the men, although, if they so desired, they might mess with the officers. The secretaries live, eat and sleep in the camp. One secretary struck the keynote of their success by saying that he couldn't tell how they reached the men, but that, in his own case, he tried his best to put his heart into his handshake. The fact that it "got across" was well evidenced by the benches, placards, bulletin boards and other accessories of the tents which had been made by non-coms and enlisted men, either on their own initiative or promptly at the merest suggestion from a secretary that such a thing was desirable. One placard, repeated in substance in every tent, topped by a big red triangle, told the boys to "Look for the Red Triangle when you get to France."

The counter service supplies the men with candles, soap, stamps, matches and various other small accessories which are not supplied by the quartermaster's department. It furnishes paper and string for the tying up of parcels, this being free to the men in any quantity, although sometimes a man will think he is getting too much for nothing and try to pay for it. It takes care of the mail, and every day the mail-sack leaves each Y. M. C. A. tent with letters and packages from the boys at camp for the folks at home. Prominent at each counter is the pile of letter paper and envelopes which is free to the men and which will be known from Maine to California and from Minnesota to Texas before the war is over. Each letterhead bears the flag in the left-hand corner and the red triangle at the right, and many a mother will thank God for the organization back of this red triangle, as the days of combat follow the days of preparation.

ON each side of the tent, long tables stretch back from the counter and at all times of the day enlisted men will be found there writing home. In one corner of the tent other men will be found gathered about a phonograph which is well supplied with records, and other groups will be gathered about a checker game or just outside pitching iron rings at a stake. In the opposite end of the tent from the counter is the speaker's platform, and in the center are seats where men may sit and read or talk or entertain visitors. While the Y. W. C. A. maintains a hostess tent at every camp, a great many of the men seem to prefer to meet their families and friends in the Y. M. C. A. tent, where they feel at home. The secretary of one tent showed the writer the exact spot upon which a soldier and his sweetheart had on the day before plighted their troth. The girl had come across many states to see her soldier boy, and the secretary guessed that she was not greatly surprised at the question—the same old question upon which the heart of the world has swung for generations past and upon which it will swing for many more to come.

But the activities of the Association are not confined to the tent. Equipment for athletics, baseball, football, boxing or other similar games is furnished to the men. On one bright starlit night in one of the tents near one of the aviation fields, the secretary built a great bonfire and he sent word through the camp that there would be "hot dogs" and marshmallows for toasting for every man who came. More than a hundred men gathered about the fire, and before they left the secretary had organized them into a Bible class. Twice a week there is a religious service in the tent, sometimes they have three a week, and nearly every night sees something doing on the platform in the big tent—and how the fellows do crowd up and listen! Some of the best speakers, biggest preachers and most prominent entertainers in the country are on the Army Y. M. C. A. circuit today. And when the weather permits there are "movies" out of doors on one of the drill grounds.

The secretaries are welcome visitors to the tents, and Bible classes are held, sometimes impromptu, but usually by prearrangement, wherever a few men can be gathered together. Few of the men have failed to receive from some organization a copy of the New Testament. Some have three. One young man who was just raking in a fairly comfortable jackpot in a poker game told the writer that he had three but he hadn't read 'em much. Then his companions laughed and said they guessed it wouldn't hurt him to read them a little more. Poker and "craps" might be said to infest every camp, for, as we said before, the men must have something to do. The secretaries do not look with holy horror upon these games of chance. They laugh and joke with the men and get as many as they can to take the Testaments and sign the pledge to read them regularly; invite the men to the tent and tell them about the good things that are coming, and do all they can to get them away, where better influences will surround them.

ONE man, half asleep in a tent where a poker game was under way, aroused by the voice of the secretary, asked for an Old Testament. He said he read his New Testament through twice and he liked it; now he wanted the Old. The writer promised to see that he got one, which he did the next day, by courtesy of the American Bible Society. Thus in a single tent as in a single town there are men ready to listen to the Word and others careless of its message; but all of them welcome the man with the little red triangle on his sleeve, and all of them are ready to honor him and to respect the manly sort of religion for which he stands. Some of the men guy good-naturedly the fellows who

AMERICAN SHIP HIT. The Navy Department announced on October 17 that an American torpedo-boat destroyer had been torpedoed by a German submarine which was not seen by the crew of the destroyer. The explosion of the torpedo killed Gunner's Mate O. K. Ingram, who was blown overboard, and wounded five others of the crew. The destroyer made port, although she was said to be badly damaged. The American transport Antilles, homeward bound, was torpedoed on October 17, with the loss of 70 of the 237 persons on board. Sixteen of the men lost were soldiers returning home. The ship was hit near the engine-room bulkhead, and sank in five minutes. The submarine was not seen, nor was the torpedo. The convoying vessels rescued those saved.

STILL TALKING PEACE. The organizing committee of the Stockholm Conference, which was postponed, published a manifesto on October 18 regarding peace questions. It declared that in this war neither side would conquer and that the war had proved that the system of force must be displaced by the system of right, which would bring to an end protectionism and militarism. It explained "no annexations" as meaning the status quo before the war, but with the friendly regulation of boundaries in the interest of the inhabitants, and it declared that "no indemnities" did not include reparation for acts contrary to the Hague Convention. It suggested that restoration of territories laid waste be effected by an international fund. It declared for international autonomy, for the organization of different nationalities as federated states. The manifesto declared for the complete restoration of Belgium, with autonomy for Flanders and Wallonia, with an indemnity to Belgium from Germany; the question of Alsace-Lorraine to be settled by a vote of those qualified to vote at the last election in Alsace before the war. Future peace, according to the manifesto, to be guaranteed by a league of nations based on compulsory arbitration and general disarmament. The Central Executive Committee of the Petrograd Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates drew up a peace program as a part of their instructions, to M. Skobeleff, their delegate to the Inter-Allied Conference at Paris. The program of the committee provides for the evacuation by the Germans of all former Russian territory which they now occupy. It provides for the restoration of Belgium, Serbia and Montenegro, with compensation from an international fund, and for the restoration of Rumania on condition that she grant autonomy to the Dobrudja and equal rights to the Jews. It suggests autonomy also for Bosnia and Herzegovina, for the Italian provinces of Austria, and for Turkish Armenia. It provides for the solution of the Alsace-Lorraine and Balkan disputes by a vote of the people, and suggests the restoration of all colonies to Germany and the re-establishment of Greece and Persia, the neutralization of all straits leading to the inner seas, and also the Suez and Panama Canals, and asks that the conditions of peace be settled by a Peace Congress consisting of delegates elected by the people. It calls for gradual disarmament by all nations on land and sea, and the establishment of a non-military system.

PLOT AGAINST LIBERTY LOAN. The Treasury Department reported on October 17 that there was evidence of a widespread plot throughout the country against the Liberty Loan, its opponents attempting to influence prospective investors privately and even going so far as to threaten the withdrawal of their deposits from banks which were supporting the loan. Secretary McAdoo announced at Salt Lake City the following day that any person attempting to intimidate a bank by threatening to withdraw or by withdrawing deposits would be prosecuted "to the limit of the law." It was announced on the 22d that the total of subscriptions then in sight was in the neighborhood of $1,900,000,000. On October 20 the first section of the German submarine U-C 5, which was captured last year by the British, was escorted from the docks in New York to Central Park, where it was erected as a Liberty Loan booth and rechristened "U-Buy-a-Bond." The total weight of the three sections was 110 tons. Admission to the submarine was to be free to all owners of a Liberty Bond.

The Question of the Slav

DR GRAY, in next week's issue of the Christian Herald will tell what prophecy has to say about the future of the great nation which decided last February to do without a government. Maynard Owen Williams in the same issue will continue his story of the present conditions in Russia, which will be supplemented by another authoritative article on the part its women have played in the life of the youngest of republics, which began its life by recognizing woman's rights to full citizenship

Eber Had a Bad Cold? Dr. Vail will tell next week how to avoid colds.

There are riches untold. Dr. Jowett's November sermon tells of "The Riches of His Grace."

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Dr. Garfield, fuel administrator, called on miners and operators in all coal fields to put an end to strikes as a patriotic duty. Officers of the union co-operated with Dr. Garfield in the settlement of industrial troubles, calling off strikes and declaring that locals which persisted in refusal to work would have their charters withdrawn. . . . The Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Terestchenko, declared at Petrograd on the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Kosciusko that "any peace should recognize the independence of an indivisible Poland." . . . General Alvaro Obregon, the Mexican general who kept Carranza the first chief, declared to interviewers in New York City on October 19 that Mexico was all at peace except for a small district in the neighborhood of Tampico and another in the mountain districts of Durango where Villa and a few bandits were hemmed in by the Mexican army. . . . The railway strike in Argentina was called off on October 18 after twenty-three days. . . . It was announced on October 16 that a million tons of shipping would be sent to sea by American shipyards by March 1, which would include both new construction and foreign vessels to be repaired and rebuilt. The following day it was announced that plans had been made for working the yards on a twenty-four hour schedule, which would materially increase the total previously announced. It was also announced that ships in the Pacific and coast trades would be put in trans-Atlantic service, 280,000 tons to be used in carrying munitions and foodstuffs badly needed by France. . . . The American State Department on October 16 transmitted to Stockholm a message in the Swedish code from Minister Ekengren to his government urging it to take steps to obtain the release of three pouches and two boxes of official mail which were held at the British Embassy at Washington. The pouches, which were seized at Halifax, had been unopened. The British government said they had reason to suspect their contents, and would only permit them to be opened in the presence of Swedish and British or Swedish and American authorities. This the Swedish minister refused to agree to. It was suggested that the boxes might contain the long-delayed data as to Swedish import and export trade for which the Embargo Board had been waiting before authorizing any exports to Sweden. . . . Senator Paul O. Husting of Wisconsin was accidently killed on October 21 by his brother while out duck hunting. . . . President Van Aalst of the Netherlands Overseas Trust Company issued on October 20 an open letter to President Wilson pleading for the release of Dutch Ships. He called attention to the strained relations between the United States and Holland, and declared that the American action in refusing bunker coal to the Dutch steamers was cutting Holland off from her colonies, and "interfering with the peaceful, harmless

Ancient Roman Villa Uncovered

WHILE excavating the foundation of a new building recently along the Tiburtine road, some three miles away from Rome, Italy, the remains of a villa were brought to light. The government archeologists have ascertained that the villa belongs to the first half of the second century before Christ, and that it was the suburban residence of a wealthy citizen. How dumb are the stones of that ruined mansion! They cannot tell whether the owner was lean or fat, tall or short, homely or handsome. They do not say what occupation he followed. They do not know who his wife was. They cannot even tell what his name was. There is dead silence in the ruins of that home; not a sound of laughter, or song, or crying; not a single word of life or love. How the stones of that ancient mansion mock human pomp and pride! How haughtily that rich man rode in his chariot into the city to business and back home again! As far as this earth is concerned, the dead stones are more immortal than he. It is God's plan to sweep one generation into the grave to make room for another. It is his plan to cover the graves of the dead with the dust of oblivion so thickly that there may be new ground for the footsteps and activities of the generation succeeding. Many of the great cities of antiquity are buried so deeply under the dust of time that the spade has not been able to find them. We have models of Solomon's temple, but has any one ever found its stones or its sacred utensils? The mutabilities of life have a wise provision. They are to drive us to the immutabilities. We are tripped up by the mutabilities of life, that we may throw up our hands and take the hand of the immutable, which is God. We are not allowed to stay always on this earth, because it is too little for us. This earthly body is too frail and too small for us, and that is why God lays it in the dust and releases the soul and sends it out into wider ranges, more lofty altitudes, and a more magnificent destiny. If the rich man who owned the Roman villa obeyed that law of conscience of which Cicero spoke so plainly, and worshiped the Deity as best he could under the light he had, he went away not without hope. The mastery of immortality over earthly mutation and decay is thus beautifully expressed: "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens." (II Cor. 5 : 1.)

Catskill Aqueduct Celebration

SEVENTY-FIVE years ago, the Croton water was turned into the city of New York and the event was celebrated with a procession seven miles long. That was on October 14, 1842. On October 12, 13 and 14, 1917, the celebration of the opening of the water supply from the Catskill Mountains, 120 miles away, was held with a succession of most imposing ceremonies. Next to the Panama Canal and closely crowding it in importance, the aqueduct is considered the greatest piece of engineering in the world. Starting at an elevation of 610 feet above the tide level in the mountains and creating four large lakes on its way, the aqueduct burrows under valleys, tunnels through mountains, dives under rivers to a depth of 1,114 feet below sea level, bores through the solid rock of Manhattan Island, and delivers pure mountain water to every borough of the city. It is 120 miles long and can deliver 500,000,000 gallons of water a day. The great Roman Aqueduct was only one-half as long, and not nearly so difficult to construct. The Panama Canal is not half as long. The water flows through 3,127 miles of city-owned water mains, with 66,300 gates. There are 49,200 fire hydrants ready for its use. An important feature of the celebration was the pageant in the sheep pasture of Central Park, an allegorical performance depicting American Indian tributes to the "Good Gift of Water." It was participated in by a thousand children, a thousand young women from Hunter College, and others. Just as the medicine men prayed for rain, sure enough the rain came and dampened the last fourth of the performance, sending the 3,000 spectators in all directions. On Sunday, October 14, many of the churches of New York celebrated the event with appropriate sermons and songs. Rev. Dr. Walter Laidlaw was the chairman of a committee having the matter in charge. This recognition of the event by the church was appropriate, since water is essential to life, and pure water to health. The Bible and the Christ used it as a symbol of the Divine Spirit, so essential to spiritual life. Hezekiah constructed a huge aqueduct and brought pure water from the mountains into the city of Jerusalem. "And the rest of the acts of Hezekiah, and all his might, and how he made a pool, and a conduit, and brought water into the city, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah?" (II Kings 20 : 20.)

Officer Married by Telephone

THE other day, Lieutenant James O. Taylor, a West Point graduate serving at Camp Mills, was joined by his bride, formerly Miss Ruby G. Knight, of Bainbridge, Ga. He was married to her on September 28 over a long distance telephone wire. Three years ago they became engaged, but his duty as an officer took him to San Francisco and then to China. When Lieutenant Taylor learned that he was soon to go to France he applied for a leave of absence for the purpose of making Miss Knight his wife, but his application was refused. It was suggested that he could be married by telephone. Rev. J. Shers of Bainbridge read the wedding ceremony over the long distance telephone in the presence of Miss Knight. While her family and friends listened, the groom listened over the long distance telephone and made the responses. The ring was placed on the young woman's finger by proxy. Lieutenant Austin Humphreys stood by the side of the groom as his best man. Love united in marriage, so beautiful, so sweet; so divine, is used as a symbol of the relation between Christ and the Church: "I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife." (Rev. 21 : 9.)

Bomb Reveals Legacy

IN a house wrecked by enemy airmen in London a few days ago, the family found that an old bureau, which had been handed down as an heirloom for nearly a century, was split in two, revealing a secret inner cabinet. In this cabinet a number of private papers were discovered, including a will relating to property of whose existence the family had not known before. The will has now been filed and attested in the proper legal manner, and the family expect to be several thousand dollars richer for the bombing of their home. Sometimes good comes out of the ills, even the evils of life. That old bureau held a secret, but the explosion came and the revelation occurred. The fires of the last day will reveal every secret thing. "There is nothing hid that shall not be known." (Matt. 10 : 26.)

Passengers Badly Frightened

PASSENGERS arriving at an Atlantic port the other day on a Spanish liner from Mexico told of a terrible fright they got when the vessel had been out two days. They were seated in the main saloon chatting when a fierce cry of "Submarine!" was heard. One shriek followed another: "Submarine! submarine!" The wildest excitement prevailed. Some rushed to the lifeboats, others seized the life-preservers and put them on, and pandemonium reigned for about fifteen minutes, when it was learned that the alarm had been sounded by a parrot who had learned or been taught the word "submarine." The passengers would not be quieted until the owner brought the pet parrot and made him give the alarm in successive shrieks. The parrot has almost the human word and voice, but it lacks the soul which makes us akin to God. Christ thus expresses the superiority of human to bird life: "Ye are of more value than many sparrows." (Matt. 10 : 31.)

Rich Ruby Yield

THE ruby mines of Burma have had a rich yield this year, that of the famous Migox mine alone amounting to about $350,000,000. Weight for weight, a ruby is more valuable than a diamond, and it is estimated that a ruby the color of pigeon's blood and weighing five carats will bring ten times the price of a diamond of the same weight. Furthermore the value increases with the size of the stone. Every precaution is naturally taken to prevent the precious object from being lost or stolen. When the ruby earth is dug from the mine it is placed in iron bins, which are then locked and transported to the sorting room at the surface. Here the soil, which may contain gems worth a fortune, is tipped into a pulsator, which breaks the earth up and finally washes it away from the rubies. In Bible times the ruby was a very precious gem. There is this reference to it in the estimation of the value of wisdom: "She is more precious than rubies." (Gen. 4 : 3.)

Christ's Gift of Soul Freedom

*A REFORMATION SERMON BY PASTOR W. F. SCHOENFELD

TEXT—Gal. 5 : 1. R. V. "With freedom did Christ set us free; stand fast, therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage."

A JUBILEE in the midst of the greatest calamity that has ever overtaken mankind! Is this not a strange undertaking, a denial of all patriotism, humanity and Christianity? No, it is not. For the Reformation, the Four Hundredth Anniversary of which we now commemorate, has given back to mankind the greatest treasure God in his infinite grace has vouchsafed to man, the treasure which in the last analysis alone gives to life real worth, insures the attainment of the soul's deepest longing, gives strength to fight with patience, fortitude and joy life's fierce and fiercest battles, and, finally, constitutes the root and bulwark of all the glorious liberties which are the essence of all genuine Democracy, the safety of which Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States, has declared the only object of our country's entrance into the present terrible world war.

Far from being a denial of genuine patriotism, humanity and Christianity, the celebration of the Reformation Jubilee is a solemn duty imposed upon us by every truly patriotic, humane and Christian impulse—a duty which the sadness of these war times should make us the more eager to fulfil, to the end that this priceless treasure may be brought to the knowledge of an ever increasing multitude of men, and fill their hearts with cheer and hope.

Since the entrance of Christianity upon the world arena no more glorious, though also no fiercer, spiritual struggle has been fought than that unwittingly inaugurated by the Monk of Wittenberg, Martin Luther, when on the 31st of October, 1517, he nailed to the chapel door at Wittenberg his ninety-five theses against the Papal indulgences. In both of these struggles the momentous issue at stake was the same, and that issue was "the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free," the liberty of the soul.

WHAT is this soul liberty? First, it is the restoration of man to all the rights and privileges of divine kinship, the reestablishment of the same relationship between man and God in which our first parents rejoiced before the fall. Secondly, it is the restitution within man's soul of the true child-mind, of the same spiritual character possessed by Adam and Eve before they became corrupted and enslaved by sin.

This liberty, wrought for the fallen world by the Christ, the incarnate Son of God, Rome, through the perversion of Christ's Gospel, had completely suppressed, and had reimposed upon Christ's disciples the yoke of bondage from which he had freed them; this liberty Luther by God's grace restored to mankind through the recovery of the truth in Christ, the true teaching of his divine gospel.

No man informed as to Rome's teaching will deny that Rome leaves man under a galling yoke of bondage. Rome's teaching is that Christ has wrought deliverance only from original sin and the eternal penalties of sin. It therefore leaves the sinner, converted to faith in Christ, under the law and under all actual sins, the sins committed by himself; leaves him under the necessity of effecting his justification before God by his own fulfilment of all the law and his own atonement for all his transgressions of God's holy law. Not salvation, but only the power for salvation is given to man by faith in Christ. Who does not perceive that this makes of life one endless, painful drudgery, and withholds from man all genuine peace of conscience, all sure hope of eternal life!

IN opposition to Rome, Luther proclaimed this to be the true content of Christ's Gospel: Christ, mankind's Mediator, has fulfilled all the law of God in mankind's stead; likewise, has made atonement for all the sins of all the world; likewise, has vanquished all the powers of sin, death and hell. Thus he has gained for all the world, as a free gift of grace, liberty from all the law of God, from all the guilt and penalty of sin, and from the dominion of sin. Coming to faith in Christ, man is at once justified of God, reconciled to him, restored to all the rights and privileges of divine kinship, and hence to the heritage of eternal life. There is nothing left for the believer in Christ to earn, all is already his through God's free grace in Christ. Yet with faith in Christ is also given to man freedom from the power of sin. His soul is transformed into likemindedness with Christ. He is given the true child mind, the essence of which is true love for God, in consequence whereof, though no more under the law, he can not but crave and strive with all his soul to do the will of God as revealed in his holy Law. The very character of his new mind constrains him to follow after holiness, to emulate the example of his Lord and Master.

What a mighty difference between Rome's teaching and Luther's presentation of Christ's Gospel! And who does not immediately perceive that only the latter insures to man true liberty of the soul and with it true joy in life, true solace in all the trials and tribulations of this present world, and, above all, the sure hope of eternal life? What sorrow must fill our hearts were any doubt to remain as to the divine truth of Luther's teaching!

BUT there is no doubt that Luther's doctrine is the very truth taught in Christ's Gospel. What clearer statement and more convincing proof for the truth of Luther's fundamental teaching as to the soul liberty secured by Christ for all the world could one desire than is given in these words of the Christ: "The Son of man is come to save that which is lost." "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets; I am come not to destroy, but to fulfil." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Or in these words of his great apostle Paul, which follow our text: "Christ is become of no effect to you, whosoever of you are justified by the law, ye are fallen from grace; for we through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith." Or in these other words of the same apostle: "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." "To him that worketh not, but believeth that God justifieth the ungodly, to him faith is counted for righteousness." What clearer statement than these words of John could be desired in proof of the truth that Christ has delivered us from the guilt and penalty of even our actual sins: "If any one sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world." Again, what clearer proof could any one desire for the truth that it is pure love only, without any idea of merit, which does and must impel the Christian to do the will of God, serve him and all his fellow men, than these words of St. Paul: "The love of Christ constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if One died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should henceforth not live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them and rose again."

IS it not, from these passages of Holy Writ, shown beyond all dispute that Luther did indeed restore the pure Gospel teaching, and that the liberty wrought by Christ for all the world, and into the possession of which all sinners enter by faith, is the restoration of all the rights and privileges of divine kinship and the restoration of the true child mind? By faith in Christ, through the unmerited grace of God, we all become, as Peter declares, royal priests of God, and in the words of John, kings and priests. Princes and princesses of the Lord Most High are we by faith in Christ. Can there be any question then of our having direct, immediate access to our God, or of our being possessed of all the rights and powers secured by Christ for his church, and with which he has invested his church on earth? Brothers and sisters are we one and all. He, the only great High Priest, stands above us as our Lord and Ruler. Such is Christ's own clear and emphatic statement: "One is your Master, Christ; but ye are all brethren."

Brethren in Christ we are one and all; therefore we are all equal in our rights; therefore the power of the keys is the common possession of all Christians; therefore there are not, and never can be of right, in Christ's Church on earth any rulers, hierarchs, autocrats, nor any orders or castes. All who are to hold office of right in Christ's Church must hold office through the election and call of a Christian congregation. All officials of the church are only the servants of the church, of their brethren, and remain accountable to them. Their only mission is the faithful ministration of the means of grace instituted by Christ himself, and they must ever be willing to submit to the judgment of their brethren, to prove all their teaching and other official acts to be in strict accord with God's own Word, command and institution. In the words of Paul, they are not rulers over our faith, but helpers of our joy. Under Christ, so far as Christians are concerned, the church is a democracy. Luther did not rebel against any divinely constituted authority. What he did achieve was to drive out of Christ's Church the self-constituted autocrats, the usurpers of the rights and powers which by Christ's gift are made the common possession of all his disciples.

THE Bible is the Constitution of the Christian democracy, the Church of Christ, the freemen of God. As we freemen of America must study our Federal Constitution, and permit no man to violate its provisions or to twist its clear statements, so, too, if we freemen of God would stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, we must study our Bible and by it test all teachings of even the highest officials in the church. The Bible is the Magna Charta of our spiritual liberty. And can any one grasp the full import of that glorious soul liberty, which is given us to possess through a clear knowledge of the true Gospel, and not perceive how inevitably the spirit it awakens in man must make for all that is embraced in the true brotherhood of man!

True though it is that the church must limit herself to her own, the spiritual sphere, it is equally true that the religious principles inculcated in the minds and hearts of men, determining their entire conception of life, will also necessarily determine their attitude toward the practical issues of life, and preeminently their attitude toward their fellow men. Ponder, now, what must be the necessary effect upon a man's outlook on life, and his attitude toward all his fellow men, when he has come to know himself as a freeman of God through Christ and all the members of Christ's Church as freemen and therefore brethren, equal in their rights, powers and privileges, with none other lord or ruler above them than the Christ, their Saviour. The man becomes filled with the spirit of Christ, the spirit of self-sacrificing love, the spirit that constrains him to seek the welfare of all his brethren and fellow men and to see in such service the true purpose of life and genuine joy of life. How in the light of such conviction, and governed by such a spirit, can man do otherwise than throw all his influence against any and every form of selfishness, tyranny and autocracy, and labor with all his might to secure for all men the same rights and the same opportunities and all that is helpful to true happiness? What else is the real foundation and bulwark of genuine liberty and democracy among men but the love of your neighbor as your true and equal brother?

TRUE soul liberty inevitably leads to the establishment of every other liberty. Yet this liberty may be had even where none other exists. Of all liberties the greatest, it is also the one indispensable treasure for the true and eternal happiness of every human being. The soul that fails to grasp this liberty misses all there is of real peace, solace and joy in life. He only can enjoy serenity of soul and tranquillity of conscience who knows himself at peace with God. He only can enjoy solace amid all the sore trials of life who can with all confidence look up to God as his reconciled Father, and trust him to protect him in all his ways. Such a one can face death with the triumphant heart of the victor who knows that by grace heaven is his sure heritage, and that death is only the messenger of God to usher him into the eternal communion.

This is what that soul liberty means which Christ wrought for us by his vicarious obedience and sacrifice. This is the liberty which, with the pure teaching of Christ's Gospel, Luther and his co-laborers were permitted to restore to the world—the liberty which is offered to all as a free gift in Christ, the liberty which God through his apostles still exhorts all Christians to hold fast, and not to allow themselves to be entangled in any yoke of bondage.

Have you, by God's grace and through the Gospel of Christ, come to be a freeman of God? Oh, then lift up your voice in praise of the marvelous love and mercy of your God and Saviour wherever you go. Glorify your Redeemer and Liberator in all your life by the manifestation of genuine spiritual liberty, as opposed to all license and anarchy. And lift high the banner of Christ's pure Gospel, laboring with all your strength and all your means to spread throughout the earth this liberty wherewith Christ has made us free.

May God, in his mercy, help us to stand fast in the liberty that is ours through Christ! May he give us zeal and power to carry this liberty to all the children of men! Amen.

The Soul's Hill-Country

SUNDAY, November 4. Ps. 121 : 1. "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills." The pilgrim, approaching Mount Zion for one of the great feasts, lifted his eager eyes unto the hills for the first glimpse of the place where God's glory abode, and where He deigned to commune with His people. On the plains of Babylon the exile fondly rested the eyes of his imagination upon those far-off hills that were rich with the witness of God's glory and grace, and which would some day resound with the good news of his emancipation. To the heart-sick captive of the plains that hill-country held the promise of dawn; it was the home of vision, the birthground of his most inspiring hope. In all his cold isolation, in his bereavement that was worse than death, and in his daily drudgery this was the song of his heart. "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help."

And no soul can be healthy without its hill-country, its sacred heights whence come new mornings, and release from small limitations, and sense of space and outlook. The very monotony of the plains, the unrelieved stretch of dead level, becomes oppressive, and tends to afflict the soul with the feeling of imprisonment. I have recently met a noble Scotsman, a man who is doing great ministerial work out on the vast prairies of Canada;—and how that man's heart yearns for the hills and mountains of his native land! But in imagination he climbs them every day! He roams the well-known tracks to the well-known heights! The Grampians are on the prairies! Ben Cruachan and Ben More are nearer than his neighbor across the way. It might truly be said of him that "in his heart are the ways of the Highlands," as "the ways of Zion" were said to be in the hearts of the exiles of long ago. Such men carry their hill-country with them, and passing through prairies or wildernesses they fill them with springs and running streams.

And so must the soul lift up its eyes unto the hills. And the soul must climb its hills even when its circumstances are like a low monotonous plain. It must climb the mount of the revealed purposes of God. It must take a turn up the slopes of some outstanding promise. Get thee up into the high mountains of grace! Look up and get up where good tidings are born, and where thou canst see the land that is very far off! "Go stand upon the mount before the Lord!" "If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things that are above, where Christ is, seated on the right hand of God." J. H. J.

The Secret of the Untroubled Heart

MONDAY, November 5. John 14 : 27. "Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." If ever the world needed a recipe for trouble and fear, that time is now. The world is in deep trouble. Fear tortures all our hearts. There never before were so many men in arms. There never were so many new-made graves as now. There never were so much hatred, jealousy and suspicion among the nations. There are those who say Christianity has collapsed. Certainly something has collapsed, but it is not Christianity. Civilization has collapsed, un-Christian civilization, which contains so large a residuum of barbarism.

Were the words of Jesus above quoted spoken with a view to such a time as this? Do they apply to the people of our age? Boldly let us answer: Jesus had in mind just such contingencies. He spoke these words at the darkest period of his own life, and that age was not far from the darkest age in the world's history. Men's hearts melted with fear. Evil men were blaspheming God, and good men were in despair. Yet Jesus said, "Let not your heart be troubled, neither it be afraid."

Christ's cure for trouble and fear is very simple. We are not blind to his essentially spiritual meaning when we say that his cure for trouble and fear is mental. The only permanent cure must be wrought upon the mind itself in its attitude toward the source of trouble. Christ's cure is not mental paralysis, stupefaction, a permanent state of intellectual neutrality, carelessness of consequences, but rather a restful faith. First, faith in Christ himself, which is personal and spiritual; and next a faith in Christ's own faith, and this is mental.

Having this faith we fear nothing where Jesus feared nothing. We are not troubled by things that did not trouble him. In his philosophy, trouble and fear take their proper place in life's perspective, and that is only the place of the cloud on the horizon. The cloud may grow larger and blacker, and may break, but we shall not be afraid; we shall bear up and steer straight forward and make the desired haven at last. The haven we make may not be the haven we have set our desire upon, but it will be the haven of God's own choice for us. C. C. A.

Apostasy

TUESDAY, November 6. Gal. 1 : 8. "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." In these stern words Paul combats apostasy from the cardinal teaching of Christianity in the early church. A tendency had sprung up in the churches in Galatia to vitiate the Gospel of Christ, the teaching of the forgiveness of sin by grace through faith in the Redeemer. Alongside of this evangelical teaching the old legal ordinances of Judaism were being introduced, and it was claimed that these were necessary for salvation. Paul declares that the persons who do this may seek to pass as evangelists, as the bearers of another gospel, but in reality they are perverters of the true Gospel and deserve to be anathematized. The reference of the apostle to an angel from heaven in this connection does not suggest a possibility, but expresses in most solemn terms the apostle's belief in the finality of the Gospel which he has preached. It cannot be amended, supplemented, altered in the least detail. It is the last word that can be spoken on the question: How can I be saved? Preaching the Gospel means telling men of the service which God has rendered them in Jesus Christ to reclaim them from sin and despair. Such preaching honors God. Teaching men that they must win the divine favor by observing ordinances set up by men may be very attractive, but God regards it as blasphemy, and places it under the curse. It is an insult to his mercy and love and to the work of his Son. Preachers of a gospel other than that which rests on the atonement of Jesus Christ are men-pleasers. They may gather fame and fortune from carnal-minded men, but they are unfruitful servants of Christ and enemies to the highest interests of the soul.

Liberty

WEDNESDAY, November 7. Isa. 61 : 1. "To proclaim liberty to the captive." One of the chief purposes of human governments is the bestowment of liberty upon all its subjects. No other word so thrills the patriotic heart as does liberty. It is loved more than life; men will roam sea and land to rest under the folds of the flag of liberty. Its waving leads legions onward to the battlefield, where soldiers die happily while liberty's banner is in the van of victory.

Liberty means the slave emancipated from his chains; it means freedom from the rack of torture, from the heel of tyrants, from the rule of bigots, from the bond binding the mind and the soul of manhood. Liberty means the banishment of the taskmaster of the oppressor, of the devil and his minions. Liberty stands under the stars and sings the song of freedom from the power of sin and from the crushing rule of despotism and militarism.

The country that possesses the power and willingness to help redeem mankind from beggary, ignorance and the slavery of the conscience will ever become the land of the free and the home of the brave. All races, religions and languages will delight to find shelter and a home in such a country. E. W. C.

Life More Abundant

THURSDAY, November 8. I Kings 4 : 29. "And God gave Solomon wisdom, and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart." People of certain temperaments are inclined to certain sins. The ambitious are in danger of pride. The acquisitive are in peril of greed. The volatile temperament is likely to be unduly elated one day, and unduly depressed the next. The strong-willed are disposed to "lord it" over others, while the weak-willed are apt to be too easily influenced. The ascetic type is blind to life's joy and beauty, while the esthetic type must guard itself against the tyranny of the flesh and of the senses. There are some sins to which we are all predisposed. One of these is that of littleness. It is easy to be content to live narrow lives, to be satisfied to be less and to do less than we ought; to let our noblest faculties lie dormant; to carry on our life work on a low plane, untouched by the motives which make high souls. The trouble with most of us is, we do not perceive that littleness and greatness are essentially of the spirit. A king may be a small soul. A peasant may be an ample soul.

The keynote of the Christian religion is the development of the individual to the utmost of his powers. No one of us can follow Christ closely, and live a narrow life. We may not be given great tasks, but life takes on new dimensions. Michelangelo, working on his statue of David, put a lighted candle in the visor of his cap, and so prevented any shadow of himself falling upon his work. Worldliness disqualifies us for spiritual greatness, for largeness of heart. False pride, social envy, wrath, ignorance, low ideals, immoderate love of ease and pleasure, unbridled passion—all these are prison bars to keep our souls within a meager compass. We may get out; we may break the bars; our souls have a strong Friend who opens gates of iron and breaks down thick walls, and leads us to high viewpoints and vast outlooks. God awaits only our prayer to deliver from bondage to little things, to make us comrades of his Son. C. C. A.

Faith

FRIDAY, November 9. Hab. 2 : 1-4. "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower; and will watch to see what he will say unto me, and what I shall answer when I am reproved. And the Lord answered me. . . . The just shall live by faith." The last words are quoted in the New Testament to show the necessity and power of faith. Luther, who made this text the center of his teaching, says:

"Such words as the following will become the common cry: Pray, where are now the prophets who promised us salvation? What fine fools have they made of us! Believe, whoever will, that it will come to pass! Thus does reason behave when God fulfils his word in another way than it has imagined. Men will not believe God at any time. Does he threaten? Then the present prosperity hinders us from believing. Does he promise grace? Then the present calamity hinders us. Then the prophets first of all endeavor to labor with the unbelieving, faint-hearted people. Therefore I stand, says the prophet, as one upon a tower, and contend strongly and firmly for the weak in faith against the unbelieving. Some take up the Jewish objection, pretend to be wise, and pass judgment upon Paul, as if he had dragged in Habakkuk unfairly and forcibly by the hair, since Habakkuk speaks of his 'table,' and not of the Gospel; though his table also speaks of the Gospel, which was then future and which has come, just as Christ is the same yesterday, today, and forever, although he is announced in a different way before and after his coming. But that is a matter of no importance; it is nevertheless the same faith and spirit. The truth which one has in his heart is called 'faith,' firmness, stability, faithfulness, fidelity, and by that he clings to the faithfulness and fidelity of another. Now I let it pass, whoever may be disposed to quarrel about it, that he who has the feeling in his heart which cleaves to another as faithful and true, and depends upon him, may call it 'truth,' or what he will; but Paul and we do not know any other name for such a disposition than faith." The Unseen Forces

SATURDAY, November 10. II Kings 6 : 17. "The Lord opened the eyes of the young man, and he saw; and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha." God's angelic armies are all mobilized and instantly ready for action. We need not send afar to secure help; if our spiritual sight is keen, we can behold the heavenly hosts near. Elisha did not pray for the angels to come, but that the young man's eyes might be opened to see them. The natural eye is not adjusted for spiritual vision. It sees only earthly things, while reason sees for the mind, and faith for the soul. Faith deals with facts as surely as reason, while imagination revels in the realm of fancy.

If Elisha's servant had been blind, he would not have beheld the Syrian hosts around Elisha. So, when the gods of this world blind the eyes of men, they cannot see the mighty spiritual forces. Beholding heavenly revelations is an act of the whole manhood, soul, body, spirit, understanding and will. All these are surrendered when we see the invisible.

When mighty temptations, awful trials and terrible enemies are imperiling your life, you should gaze upward at the divine armies of Almighty God. Then you will become a victor, like Jacob, who, knowing that Esau was coming, received strength from an angel of God, or like Isaiah, who saw the Lord, high and lifted up, and ever after become a mighty victor. It is then that you know you are encircled by everlasting arms, as well as by angelic armies. When we shall be invited by the great Captain to go to the front to join the innumerable company of saints and angels, the heavens will be opened as they were to Stephen, and we shall behold the glory of the life of ministering which we are about to enter forever and ever. More Light on Prophecy

THE first of the new series of articles on prophecy, by Professor James M. Gray of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, will appear in next week's issue of this paper. Four articles are promised in the new series, with the following titles:

What Does the Bible Teach About Russia?
Babylon; Her Coming Restoration and Her Fall.
The Millennium: What, When and Where?
The Present War and Coming Events.

Our first series of eight articles on the "Mountain Peaks of Prophecy" raised such widespread inquiry relative to the intervening ranges that the new series has become necessary. We would urge every reader of the Christian Herald to study the series, as each article will be of intense interest and unusual timeliness. Why not also urge your friends to send for the Christian Herald and read them for themselves?

Can You Help to Solve It?

NOT humiliating but noble, because truthful and just, was the confession of the leading speakers at the Religious Congress which met in Pittsburg recently, and which is described in this issue of the Christian Herald. It was the right and courageous course to admit that the Church, through lack of organization and unity of purpose, had failed to do its duty at a juncture when, with mobilized and organized forces, it might have been able, under God, to do much toward averting the world catastrophe.

At the crisis, when all the churches of Christendom should have lifted up a united voice in protest, there was silence because of division. It was a time, as one of the speakers in the Congress aptly pointed out, when the united power of the Church, if it ever possessed spiritual authority, might have impressed thrones, parliaments and legislatures. But the splendid opportunity came and passed.

To realize one's error is a hopeful sign. To plan that it may never be repeated is wisdom. This is what the Christian Church regards as the task that lies ahead. All the arts of diplomacy are utilized by courts and cabinets and statesmen in sounding the trend of national opinion. They care little enough possibly for mere opposition, which they can easily overcome; but they know that the soul of a nation may sleep even through a temporary tumult. Let that soul be but touched by a revelation of the nobler way, and it will seek to follow it at whatever cost. For those things that are vital to the spiritual life—which is the soul's domain—it will contend to the last. All material things, even physical life itself, are to be accounted as perishable and of little value, in contrast with the things that are priceless and imperishable.

There were many strong voices raised in the Congress, some in censure and regret, but still more in encouragement. It was urged that all who are followers of the religion of Jesus Christ must unite to conquer. The Church must strive by every means at her command to become a power for God and righteousness in the world. Her future must be one of devotion and sacrifice to the principles laid down by her Founder, and no sacrifice must be accounted too much if it results in the spread of true Christianity and the upbuilding of the Kingdom in the hearts of men.

That such an aim involves far-reaching changes in the present methods and in the attitude of the Church in many respects, must be clear to all who are observant of the signs of the times. The lost ground must be regained, the shaken confidence restored, if the Church would enter into her own again. The Church must press closer to the Divine Original—must be renewed, revitalized, reinspired, reconsecrated, before she can hope to command the respect, exert the authority and enjoy the love to which she should aspire.

In common with God's people everywhere, the Christian Herald hails the indications of a general reawakening within the Church with genuine satisfaction. Such an arousal, if it be thorough and genuine as we believe it to be, can produce only good results. But the stirring note sounded by the Pittsburg Congress is not enough of itself to accomplish what is needed. It is the reveillé. The battle for a rehabilitated Church, which shall be a mighty factor in the affairs of men, is yet to come.

Who will be the leaders in this which promises to be the mightiest struggle in the Church's history? What will be the plan of campaign? This is a time for every one capable of leadership and of giving counsel, to express himself with boldness and freedom. "In the multitude of counselors there is safety," says the Scriptures. We would welcome the freest interchange of views on this all-important problem. Christianity is not on trial. The Church is waiting to be helped. What is the next step for the Christian Church in America to take in order that she may fulfil her glorious mission and render the most effective service to God and humanity, now and hereafter?

This is the overshadowing problem of the hour. There can be no greater in our lifetime. May God give us wisdom to help in its solution.

The Happiest Age

SOME sage has arisen to remark that human life up to about fifty years ago was not worth living—that only the inventions and institutions of the last half-century have made life bearable.

Unfortunately, there is no way accurately to gauge the degree of happiness of any period, or even to define exactly what happiness is.

All we can know for certain is that the happiness of our own times is the best that is attainable to us, and lucky is he who gets his share of it.

Happiness, like health, is known to us chiefly through its opposite. Health is known through disease and pain, and happiness through disappointment and misery.

The masses of mankind, until this century almost dumb, now make heard their sufferings and dissatisfaction. The woes of centuries are finding utterance in the free speech of our day. The wail may cause the unthinking to suppose that the sun of human happiness is suddenly obscured. But, to the contrary, the remedies following the better understanding of wrong conditions steadily improve the conditions under which happiness may become more general. The more we hear of wrongs, the less wrongs we have.

Philosophers may wrangle about it until doomsday, and no doubt they will; but the age which knows the least earthly misery and woe is the one that has been longest dead, and the generation that really knows what happiness is and can realize its full possession is a long time yet unborn.

The Self-Injury in Lying

LYING comes not of aggressive shrewdness, but of cowardice and of a shallow cunning that is often treacherous and tricks the lie into transparency.

It is not the danger of being found out by others that is most to be dreaded; far more dreadful is it that the liar must know himself to be a liar.

His self-respect suffers—the leaven in him loses strength and leaves him dead dough.

The cunning that leads to lying is a rot that must permeate the whole character and make a man uncertain of himself. It distorts his perspective, obscures his vision, and warps his comprehension. The habit of misrepresentation leads to misconception, the judgment becomes as erratic as the tongue, and there results the man who "couldn't tell the truth if he wanted to."

Nothing so shakes the confidence of one's friends as known lying does; nothing so shatters one's own self-confidence as does lying, whether known to others or not.

The cowardice that fathers lying increases with the lie. Fear of detection joins with self-contempt in making the liar a greater coward than before. One lie calls for another in its defense.

Soon a tangled web spun of falsehood makes it all the harder for the liar to succeed in even an honest undertaking. His lies are a chain and ball upon his foot. They are a beam in his eye and a weight on his heart. He flounders along, most of his energy being required to overcome the impediment, while the truthful man easily outstrips him.

The lying cheat in the Vicar of Wakefield, who was always swindling everybody, died in jail for debt, while his honest neighbor, who was swindled a thousand times, steadily prospered and died rich and respected. Fiction—eh? Well, it is immortal as fiction, because it is fact the world over all the time.

Thrift in Fuel

AFTER the extensive and intensive drill in economics which the nation has undergone, the value of thrift has been duly impressed upon the public mind. Now the testing time has come to put our thrift precepts into practice. Thus far our people have done well in food preparation and avoidance of waste; they have canned, and dried, and pickled, and preserved to a degree that makes all previous records insignificant. Now, with winter at hand, there comes a warning to save fuel, which should not pass unheeded. Fuel Administrator Garfield has just made an investigation of the coal situation, and reports that in many cities the commandeering of coal has already begun, in order that the comfort of the population may be assured when freezing weather sets in. In one district in Ohio, the investigators made the astonishing find of something like 1,000,000 tons of soft coal, "cached" by private interests, which may be commandeered by the government if the shortage becomes serious. Strikes have greatly reduced the output in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Pennsylvania, but these will probably be settled amicably. While the stock of coal throughout the country is lower than the average, the reports show that ten per cent. above the average has been mined. And an effort will be made to increase production further. Still, there will doubtless come a time during the winter when the pinch will be felt in many homes and a number of industries, and it is Mr. Garfield's idea that coal should be economized so as to absolutely avoid waste. He reminds us "that a shovelful should be regarded as equivalent to half a loaf of bread, half a pound of sugar, or half a pint of milk." Carelessness or wastefulness now may mean a cold house at the time when warmth is most needed. Don't rely on the chances of getting an extra supply in midwinter; get your coal bins filled now and economize day by day. The aid we are now sending to impoverished Europe, which will need to be kept up during the winter on a still larger scale, will further diminish the supply for home consumption.

We are the richest and most prosperous nation in the world today, but there are occasions when wealth itself doesn't count for everything. Take time by the forelock and prepare for winter now. Coal, like all other necessaries, is most likely up in price to stay a while, and sensible folks will govern themselves accordingly.

Wisdom in the Woods

THE recent agitation in favor of a return to wooden ships, the fact that many miles of army cantonments have been built of lumber and that the entire output of hundreds of lumber mills is still being used by the government for this purpose, bring into prominence the indispensability of wood in our modern life. Our houses and barns are mostly made of it, we walk on it, we eat from it, we sleep on it. Its uses are innumerable. And wood means trees.

When man first knelt to give thanks and offer supplication, before he had learned to hew a shaft, to build an arch or spread a roof above him, he went to the "darkling wood amidst the cool and silence." There was God's first temple, there the sacred groves in which man fought his hardest battles and gained the greatest triumphs—mastery over self, and a realization of the nearness of his Creator.

The trees of the forest, of the lawn and bordering roads and streets, are silent preachers and teachers to this day. And there is no tree but has its particular charm and teaches its own lesson. The lofty pines, uplifting their cone-tipped summits, meet on high to form an arch built on nature's loveliest lines, and moaning and sighing with every breeze, and groaning in howling winds, speak to us of grandeur, of brave resistance, of proud defiance. Evergreens, like the never-fading hemlock and cedar, seem to speak to us of perennial life and youth. Near them the oak, the patriarch of the trees—who grows three centuries, stays three centuries in his prime and decays in three—a strong, solemn, proud tree, towering skyward as if to get nearer to those tranquil heights far above turmoil and disorder, where it may drink its fill of sunlight and warmth, amid the balsam of the upper air.

Then there are the wild cherry, the hawthorn, the apple tree, with all the busy twitter and chatter of bees and birds about them; and there are the precise and orderly poplar, the willow waving us to sleep, the birch with its pure gleaming whiteness to cheer us. We feed from the cherry, the mulberry, the walnut and the chestnut, while the maple gives us the sweetest cup. If we are tired or hot, there is the shady elm, with its wide-spreading protection and cooling shadow. Do we need a strong staff, an unbending support?—the hickory gives it for the asking. The fir offers us a sweet-scented pillow of its fragrant needles; the pine gives us the cheery, warming glow in our open fireplaces.

There is wisdom to be found in the companionship of the woods. Every tree has its mission of usefulness—its allotted work in the world. Wanton destruction of the trees was specially forbidden in ancient times, and the great movements for woodland preservation and reforestation prove that the nations today, ourselves included, are alive to their value. They are the protectors of the soil, for a treeless land soon becomes a desert.

Seeing the World from the Skies

The Airplane, Its Various Forms and Its Wonderful Factories—By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1917, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE just returned from the Curtiss aviation field, where I watched some of the great flying-machines which are to be used in our war in Europe, moving about through the air. I have examined the machines as they sat on the ground, and have even taken a flight in one of the two-seated biplane scouts designed for spying upon the enemy and for making photographic maps of their trenches for the use of our army.

Standard training-machines almost completed. Add wings and propellers and they will be ready to fly

But before I describe my experience of today, I want to say a word about my first sight of an engine flying about through the sky. It was just twenty-one years ago, on an island in the Potomac River, not far from Washington. I had gone there at the invitation of Dr. Samuel Langley, who had just completed his invention of the first machine that actually flew.

The machine, which was made chiefly of steel and weighed only about as much as a four-year-old boy, was moved by a little steam engine. It was launched from a starting-stage, and it flew from the island for a distance almost as great as the length of Pennsylvania Avenue between the Treasury and the Capitol. It rose into the air and flew straight across the Potomac toward the woods, and then turned and went up the river for a short distance. Then, all the water in the boiler having been converted into steam, its motive power was gone; and it dropped gently down upon the earth.

They call this the "flying-fish." It is used for training aviators

THAT machine was the father of the great aviation industry of today. It proved the success of the principles of artificial flight, and from it was developed the man-carrying machine which, aided by Congress, Dr. Langley completed in 1903. Every one knows the tragic story of that machine. The story went out that it was a failure. The newspapers ridiculed Langley, and the blow to his sensitive nature was such that it caused his death. In 1914 the identical machine was taken to Hammondsport and successfully flown by Mr. Glenn H. Curtiss.

THE machine I saw on the Potomac compares to those which are now fighting over the battlefields of Europe as a fly to an eagle. It weighed less than fifty pounds, and it flew three-quarters of a mile in one and three-fourths minutes. The machine in which I rode through the skies today weighs almost a ton, and it flies through the air at seventy miles an hour. As it rested upon the ground it looked like some gigantic live thing from another planet.

The best idea of it, perhaps, is as a gigantic flying-fish. The fish on the ground rests on two wheels with cushioned rubber tires. They are not as large as the front wheels of the smaller of our automobiles, and they raise the body and the head of the fish so that it seems to be supported on them and on the tail. The head of the fish contains the engine hidden inside the shell; and in front of this, attached to the nose, as it were, is the propeller. This is a long blade that extends out like two horns, which, when the machine is in action, fly around at the rate of fourteen hundred times a minute, or twenty-three times a second. They make a noise like the buzzing of all the locusts of Egypt joined into one; and they turn the air in front of them into a whirlwind which flies back in a great current toward the tail.

The seats of the airplane are in two great holes cut out of the back of the fish. You sit down in its belly, as it were, not like Jonah inside the whale, for he had no view, but so low that your head only extends above the top. Right in front of you is the guide wheel, much like that of an automobile, and the rest of the steering gear by which the plane is controlled. This control includes the tail and ailerons, or fins, of the fish. The tail steers the machine just as the rudder steers the ship.

I PUT on a leather coat and a helmet which covered my ears and was given a pair of great goggles to protect my eyes. I then climbed into the hole nearest the engine. Behind me, in the second hole, sat Pilot Instructor Spratt, an aviator of the Flying Corps of the British Army, a man who had seen service in the war in Europe and has brought a number of German planes to the ground. At one time he had a sky battle with Immelmann, the famous German aeronaut, in which both sent many shots at each other. The battle was not decisive, although the British machine was severely damaged in the action.

OUR machine was started by men cranking it by giving the propeller a whirl. The engine began to work. The noise grew louder and louder, a great wind arose, and we glided over the ground, the tail dragging in the dust which rolled upward like a cloud into the air. In the meantime the whirlwind increased. The engine went faster and faster, and I had the feeling of climbing up a hill in an automobile.

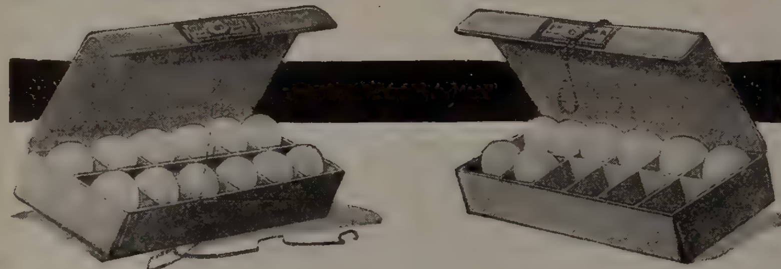
As we rose higher and higher there was no feeling of the great void beneath us. The way into the sky appeared to be as solid as the ground we had left. This feelling prevailed through the whole trip. I had none of the dizzy sensations which some people experience when they look at the ground from the top of a high building. My stomach stayed where it was, and my heart did not crawl into my throat. As we rose higher and higher my confidence increased, and I felt that I was in less and less danger. My greatest regret was that I was strapped to my seat in my tightly buttoned leather coat so that I could not get at my note-book to make a detailed description of the scenery as we flew over the country. Had I had my typewriter with me, I could have clicked it off as we flew.

As we rose I was able to look about and study the country as it lay there below me. It was a great map which changed every minute, bringing more and more into view as we mounted the sky. At the height of the Washington Monument the horizon was thirty miles distant, and at two thousand feet I could see for a radius of almost sixty miles.

THE earth below seemed to change as we rose. The world from an airplane is far different from the same world viewed on the ground. At a short distance from the surface the ragged roughness of the land disappears, and the country becomes a beautiful patchwork of field and forest of many colors and of all hues and shades of green and yellow. The fields grow smaller and smaller. The wide roads stand out like broad lines running through the green. You can see where they are raised above the rest of the country. You can mark the hills and the hollows. The whole is like a relief map, drawn to a perfect scale, the length of which decreases as you ascend.

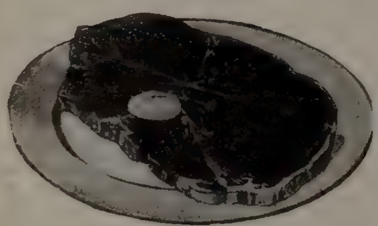
The whole is in such perfect relief that a photograph of it tells the gunners exactly where things are and just how they must shoot to land their projectiles

Interesting Facts on Food Cost

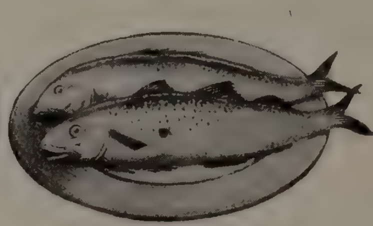


In Food Value

A 12-cent Package of Quaker Oats Equals Twenty Eggs



It Equals 2½ lbs. of Round Steak



It Equals 6 lbs. of Fresh Fish

Numerous foods which are commonly served cost from five to ten times as much as do luscious Quaker Oats.

The average mixed diet, measured by food value, costs you four times as much.

Each $1 Saves $3

So each dollar spent for Quaker Oats saves at least $3 on your table cost. A liberal use of Quaker Oats will make living cost lower than in old times.

And you will be better fed. You will have new food enjoyments. For the oat stands supreme among grain foods, in nutrition and in flavor. It is our sovereign vim-food. It is the best-balanced food we know.

Use Quaker Oats in bread and muffins, in cookies, pancakes, etc. Note the added delights. This is more than a breakfast dainty. It is Nature's master food.

Quaker Oats

The Superlative Flakes

Quaker Oats, the world around, is the favorite oat-food. That is due to a matchless flavor derived from selected oats.

In making Quaker Oats, all the puny, starved grains are discarded. We use the queen grains only—the rich and flavory oats. A bushel of choice oats yields but ten pounds of Quaker.

Yet this extra quality costs you no extra price. You get it when you ask for Quaker Oats. In these times above all times you owe that to yourself.

An Aluminum Cooker for $1.00

This aluminum double cooker is made to our order to cook Quaker Oats in an ideal way. No flavor is lost, no aroma. The oat flakes are perfectly cooked.

It is large and heavy, made to last a lifetime. Cereal capacity, 2¼ quarts.

Over 700,000 homes are now cooking Quaker Oats in this way. Now we want every home to have one. We supply only one cooker to a family.

Send us our trademarks—the picture of the Quaker—cut from the fronts of five Quaker Oats packages, or an affidavit showing the purchase of five packages of Quaker Oats. Send $1.00 with the trademarks or affidavit, and this ideal cooker will be sent to you by parcel post, prepaid. We require the trademarks or affidavit as assurance that you are a user of Quaker Oats. The trademarks have no redemption value. This offer applies to the United States and Canada. Address upon the works of the enemy. It is this that enables the spy machine to be of such value in our warfare in Europe. Every detail is visible, and the planes are now equipped with wireless telegraph instruments with which they can direct the artillery just where to fire. It was from an airplane like this that the French discovered that the whole German army was advancing toward Belgium and not making their attack as was expected upon the French frontier. That discovery saved the day in Europe, and prevented the immediate success of the Germans. As it is now, the observation planes make the most of their flights at a height of two miles above the ground. They are then out of reach of the anti-aircraft guns, and have the whole field of battle spread out below them.

RETURNING to my flight, we soared this way and that over the country, now rising, now falling, and even looping the loop at the will of the aviator. As we descended, the machine shot almost straight downward, and we were going at a rate of something like a mile a minute. We seemed to be diving straight into the earth when the pilot pulled a lever and we coasted about for a level place upon which to land. We found it in the flying field from which we had risen. As the wheels struck we bounced, I judge, as high as the tops of the orchards near by. We bounced again and again, and then skimmed over the road on the tires until we reached the exact spot from which we had started.

My machine was a military tractor of the type chosen as the training machine for our army. It is about the same as the standard machine now used for Canada and Great Britain, and it will be turned out in great numbers for training our aviators for France. Training-fields are being established in different parts of the country. There are now something like eight hundred students in the training-schools of eight great universities, and the government expects to graduate students into the advanced flying-fields at the rate of two hundred per week. The age limit for pilots is from twenty-one to twenty-seven, and the head of the training-school here tells me the best men are to be found between the ages of eighteen and twenty-three.

THE government is pushing the manufacture of airplanes for the war. They are the eyes of the army, and with enough of them we can blind the eyes of the Germans. About $700,000,000 has already been appropriated for aviation, and the program calls for the immediate construction of 22,000 airplanes, school machines and battleplanes and 49,000 airplane motors. At this writing there are about ten airplane manufacturing companies at work. They are scattered all over the United States from Nutley, New Jersey, to Los Angeles, California, and in addition the automobile factories have been mobilized for the making of engines and motors, and the furniture companies are turning out propellers and other parts made of wood, which will be put into the standard machines. More than three million feet of mahogany and black walnut will be needed for the propellers alone. Seventy-five million feet of spruce has to be cut and dried for the airplane bodies, and a thousand feet will be used for every machine. If the plans now laid work out, within a year from now we shall be turning out three-thousand airplanes per month and shall have thirty thousand in the war zone within one year after next.

The work going on in the plant of the Curtiss Aeroplane Company at Buffalo is an indication of what the United States may expect from all the airplane companies in a very short time. Much of the Buffalo plant has grown up in the last few months, although it was in operation before we entered the war, and had been making many machines for the French and British. The Curtiss Company has built altogether three hundred different types of flying-machines, and the factory here is engaged upon several standard types for the army and navy.

Owing to the restrictions of the government and the danger of giving points to our enemies, I can describe the machines only in general terms. I can say, however, that they embody the latest and best genius and invention of the aviation of today and that they are being made under the most rigid government inspection. Even the smallest machine has some thousands of parts. It is composed of metals of many kinds, woods of special varieties, and of textiles and other materials, each of which, by careful investigation and physical and chemical analysis, has been shown to be fitted for its own special place in the machine. In making the airplane each and every one of these parts is passed upon again and again, both in the raw material and the finished product, and the machine is not accepted without every part having the government stamp on it. This is so of all kinds of machines.

DURING my stay here I have gone through the plant. It now covers acres, and a great part of it has grown up within the past few months. There are several thousand men at work, and nearly every one is an expert at his special trade. Some of the fine metal-workers have come from the machine-shops of other parts of the country, and the men who do the woodwork are cabinetmakers, not a few of whom are from the great shipbuilding plants.

After the parts are made, being shaped so that they will stand or cut the wind in just the right way, they are put together with screws of brass or other metal that will not be affected by the atmosphere. A large part of the wood is of veneering glued together in order to make it stronger, and the propeller blades of the hydroplanes are edged with copper that they may not be broken as they fly around through the water. The cloth for covering the wings is a fine Irish linen, protected with a varnish, which smells like banana oil, to make it impervious to moisture.

I WISH I could show you some of the machines. There are various types intended for scouting and reconnaissance work. These will carry two passengers and travel as fast as a hundred miles an hour. They have enough gasoline to remain up four or five hours. They are to be used for photographic work and general observation high over the trenches. And then there is the battle-plane, which will carry two or three passengers, and is driven by two motors. It is equipped with machine guns which shoot through the propeller, being so timed that the projectiles do not hit, even though the blades are going around at more than a thousand revolutions per minute. The bombing machines are not considered fast, although they travel from forty-five to ninety miles an hour, and climb upward at the rate of four thousand feet in ten minutes. They are usually manned by one pilot, who has in the neighborhood of five hundred pounds of bombs to drop on the enemy. The fighting scout carries but one man. It is light and fast, and is equipped with a machine gun, which is so mounted that the whole machine is pointed at the target when firing.

Some of the most interesting of all the machines are those intended for naval work and for patrolling the coast. Among these are the hydro-airplanes, which are similar to the land machines except that they have pontoons instead of wheels fitted below the wings in order that the machine may rise from or alight upon the water.

Of this same class, but different, are the huge flying boats, sometimes called "flying whales." These boats have a wing-spread of ninety-two feet. Their bodies are forty-six feet long, and they are shaped very much like a whale. The boats are lighted by electricity, and they are so arranged that the men can easily move about in them. Each will carry a useful load of more than two thousand pounds. The boats are driven by motors of two hundred horse-power, and, including the fuel and pilot, they weigh over fifty-five hundred pounds. I understand that the company has made twenty-five of these "winged whales" for the British and French Admiralties, at a cost of about $1,500,000.

Too Beautiful to Last

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WE were coming home from a dinner party together, my friend and I. It was late of night and rather rainy, and as we sat near together in the damp, almost empty trolley car, my friend spoke very suddenly and seriously.

"Just now," she said, "I've a chance to be very happy. But I'm almost afraid to take it!"

The rain beat, in a futile manner, against the car windows. I listened to it, for a moment, before I spoke.

"Why?" I questioned at last—"why are you afraid to take your chance—to be happy?"

"Because," answered my friend, and her eyes looked far away — past the car and the rain, even—"because I'm afraid that it won't—last!"

I READ a story in a current magazine today. And after I read a certain part of it, I laid the magazine down, and I, too, looked far away. But I looked past the printed page into a damp, dimly lighted trolley-car—and into the heart of my friend who feared to grasp a vision.

In the story a wealthy old bachelor was telling his reason for never having married.

"I began to wonder," he said, "whether there was any advantage in marrying at all. I saw a lot of people who were wretchedly unhappy together and even more wretched after they had dissolved their matrimonial ties. I discovered that marriage usually meant children, anxiety, sickness and death. I took counsel of my fears. Why fall in love and marry if by doing so I was going to expose myself to the arrows of outrageous fortune? My parents were both dead. Sorrow couldn't touch me. Why invite unhappiness? If I had no family I should have only myself to look out for—to worry about—and when I died nobody would suffer agonies of bereavement on my account. So I shut myself up in my shell and built an iron wall around my affections to keep out sorrow.

"I was a fool! What wouldn't I give now to have had sorrow! Many's the time I've envied my friend with a dead child. Pain and joy go hand in hand. Deaden your capacity for one and you lose the other. Today I'd rather have had a year or so with a woman I had loved and have lost her than to be what I am—a lonely, childless, wifeless, friendless old man."

I read the paragraph over. And then I took it to a man I know—I call him sometimes, to myself—The Philosopher, because he looks so calmly, and pleasantly, and interestedly upon life.

"Read this," I said to him. And then, when he had finished—"Don't you think?" I asked, "that he—the man in the story—is a bit extreme? That part, now, about the dead child. Do you think that the reasoning is quite right?"

The Philosopher looked at me thoughtfully. And then he bowed his gray head in assent.

"I think," he told me, "that the reasoning is quite right!"

We were silent, each of us, for a space of time while I studied the printed page of the magazine, and the Philosopher traced patterns, with the toe of his shoe, on the soft rug. At last he spoke again,

"There's an old proverb," he said, "that covers the whole thing, I think. 'Tis better to have loved and lost, than never to have loved at all!' The word 'love' isn't the only one that will fit into that proverb. You can put 'live' in place of love, or 'known' or 'felt!'"

"You really believe that?" I asked. "That's your real thought?"

"Once," said the Philosopher quite irrelevantly, "I went away for a year. The doctor ordered a complete change of scene. I was young then, and I had always lived, with my books and my work, among the hills. On the doctor's advice I went to the seashore. I had never lived near the ocean before, and at first I was enthralled at the vastness and beauty of it. And then, after I had been away for a few months, I began to be strangely and unaccountably lonely. Much as I liked the sea, I longed to see my mountains again. I wanted to get away from the smoothness of the landscape. I wanted to get back to the place where the sky-line was rugged and uneven. I missed my hills."

The Philosopher paused. And then as I crossed the magazine pages, absently, with my fingers, he laughed.

"It's like that," he said. "I'm afraid that a life without any chance in it would be, to most people, like the world without any mountains in it would be to me. I'm afraid that the evenness would grow monotonous."

"I think," I said, "that you're right. 'Tis better," I mused, "to have lived, to have known, to have loved—and lost——"

"You know," said the Philosopher, "that every chance isn't a losing chance. Some people live and know and feel and love without losing!

IT is autumn now, and the leaves are crimson and gold-colored and very beautiful. We know, even as we admire them, that they will be brown and withered some day. But that doesn't keep us from loving their glorious colors.

It's like that, too, with flowers, and springtime, and the blue sky of summer. We know that the flowers will fade away, and that springtime will go, and that there will be winter stormclouds where there were once sparkles of sun.

And so this is the answer to my friend and to other friends of mine.

Never be afraid to grasp at happiness because it may not last. For happiness is as beautiful as the flowers of spring, and the sky of summer, and the vivid leaves of autumn. And even though it might not last, happiness is too beautiful to pass by with never a glance.

And then, as the Philosopher said, and as we know, don't be sure, as you take your chance at happiness, that it will not stay. Look around your circle of friends, look at your business associates, look at the casual crowds that you pass every day, and you'll see that the average of happy faces is rather high. You'll see more smiles, I think, than frowns; more merry faces than sad ones!

Don't be afraid to take a chance at happiness because you fear that it is too beautiful to last. Take your chance, instead, arguing that happiness is too beautiful not to last!

I TOOK my chance to happiness
I took it gaily, gladly—
Though others watched my joyous flight
And murmured at me sadly—
"It cannot last—it never does.
All happiness is fleeting!"
I took my chance to happiness
When others were retreating.

I took my chance to happiness—
The very earth was glowing—
Though some stood at my side and said
"Alas, she is not knowing
How sad this vivid world can be
When hope itself is dying,
When pain will follow vagrant joy
And winter winds are crying!"

I took my chance to happiness,
I took it bravely, daring!
I heeded not the mournful tongues
That spoke of fate ensnaring
I took my chance to happiness,
Though doubt rose up and tore me.
I knew adventure and romance
Lay, glowing bright, before me!

The storms came—that they told me of—
But, oh, they did not harm me!
There always was a rainbow dream
That followed them to charm me!
And now I know, despite their fears,
Through fair or cloudy weather,
That happiness and I will walk
Throughout life's way together!

Says the Fels-Naptha Home Maker

HOW many hours of hard effort do you put into washing and cleaning every week?

You can save a good part of them if you use Fels-Naptha. Most of the rubbing and scrubbing you must do under ordinary conditions vanishes when Fels-Naptha's white suds search out the dirt and grime for you.

Washday loses its dread when Fels-Naptha does the work. Not only hard rubbing, but boiling is needless. Use water at any temperature that's comfortable to the hands, and you'll get splendid results.

One week of the Fels-Naptha way will prove that it's the time-saving way.

CHAPTER XVII

BONNIE BRENTWOOD lay propped up by pillows. Her golden hair was lying in two long braids, over each shoulder, and there was a faint flush of expectancy on her pale cheeks.

"You have been so good to me!" she said. "It has been wonderful for a stranger to go out of his way so much."

"Please don't let's talk about that!" said Courtland. "It's been only a pleasure to be of service. Now I want to know how you are. I've been expecting to hear that you had pneumonia or something dreadful after that awful exposure."

"Oh, I've been through a good deal more than that," said the girl, trying to speak lightly. "Things don't seem to kill me. I've had a quite lot of hard times."

"I'm afraid you have," he said, gravely. "Somehow it doesn't seem fair that you should have had such a rotten time of it, and I be lying around enjoying myself. Shouldn't everybody be treated alike in this world? I confess I don't understand it."

Bonnie smiled feebly. "Oh, it's all right!" she said, with conviction. "'In the world ye shall have tribulation, but fear not, I have overcome the world,' you know. It's our testing-time, and this world isn't the only part of life."

"What's the idea?" said Courtland. "Don't you think I am worth the testing?"

"Oh, surely, but you may not need the same kind I did."

"You don't appear to me to have needed any testing. So far as I can judge, you've showed the finest kind of nerve on every occasion."

"Oh, but I do," said Bonnie, earnestly. "I've needed it dreadfully! You don't know how hard I was getting—sort of soured on the world! That was the reason I came away from the old home where my father's church was and where all the people I knew were. I couldn't bear to see them. They had been so hard on my dear father that I thought they were the cause of his death. I had begun to feel that there weren't any real Christians left in the world. God had to bring me away off here into trouble again to find out how good people are. He sent you to help me, and Nurse Wright; and now today the most wonderful thing has happened! I've had a letter from an utter stranger, asking me to come and visit. I want you to read it, please."

While Courtland read Mother Marshall's letter Bonnie lay studying him. And truly he was a goodly sight.

"She's a peach, isn't she?" he said, handing the letter back. "How soon does the doctor think you'll be able to travel?"

"Oh, I couldn't possibly go," said the girl, relapsing into sadness; "but I think it was lovely of her."

"Go? Of course you must go!" cried Courtland, springing to his feet, as if he had been accustomed to manage this girl's affairs for years. "Why, Mother Marshall would be just broken-hearted if you didn't!"

"Mother Marshall!" exclaimed Bonnie, sitting up from her pillows in astonishment. "You know her, then?"

COURTLAND stopped suddenly in his excited march across the room and laughed ruefully. "Well, I've let the cat out of the bag after all, haven't I? Yes, then, I know her! It was I who told her about you. And I had a letter from her two days ago, saying she was crazy to have you come. Why, she's just counting the minutes till she gets your telegram! You haven't sent her word you aren't coming, have you?"

"Not yet," said Bonnie. "I was going to ask you what would be the best way to do. You see, I have to send back that money and the mileage. Don't you think it would do to write? It costs a great deal to telegraph, and sounds so abrupt when one has had such a royal invitation. It was lovely of her, but of course you know I couldn't be under obligation like that to entire strangers."

There was a little stiffness in Bonnie's last words, and a cool withdrawal in her eyes that brought Courtland to his senses and made him remember Gila's insinuations.

"Look here!" he said, calming down and taking his chair again. "You don't understand, and I guess I ought to explain. In the first place, get it out of your head that I'm acting fresh or anything like that. I'm only a kind of big brother that happened along two or three times when you needed somebody—a—a kind of a Christ-brother, if you want to call it that way," he added, snatching at the minister's phrase. "You believe He sends help when it's needed, don't you?"

Bonnie nodded.

"Well, wait till I tell you what Mother Marshall has been through, and then if you don't decide that God sent that invitation I've nothing else to say."

COURTLAND had a reputation at college for eloquence. In rushing season his frat. always counted on him to bowl over the doubtful and difficult fellows, and he never failed. Neither did he fail now, although he found Bonnie difficult enough. But he had her eyes full of tears of sympathy before he was through with the story of Stephen.

"Oh, I would love to see her and put my arms around her and try to comfort her!" she exclaimed. "I know just how she must feel. But I really couldn't use the money of a stranger, and I couldn't go away with all this debt, the funeral, and everything!"

"Suppose you just leave that to me," he said, comfortingly. "I'll wager I can get enough out of your furniture to pay all the bills, so you won't leave any behind. Then if I were you I'd just use that check they've sent for your expenses, and trust to getting a position in that neighborhood when you are strong enough. There are always openings in the West, you know."

"Do you really think I could do that?" asked Bonnie, excitedly. "I'm a good stenographer, I've had a really fine musical education, and I could teach a number of other things."

"Oh, sure! You'd get more positions than you could fill at once!" he declared, joyously.

"Then I could soon pay them back," said Bonnie, reflectively.

"Sure! You could pay back in no time after you got strong. That would be a cinch! It might even be that you could help Mother Marshall about something in the house pretty soon. And I'm sure you'll find she just needs you. Now suppose we write up that telegram. There's no need to keep the dear lady waiting any longer."

"He thinks I really ought to go," said Bonnie to the nurse, who had just returned.

"Didn't I tell you so, dear?" said the nurse.

"I couldn't go at once," said the girl, a shade of trouble coming into her eyes. "I must go back and pack up my things, you know, and clean the room."

Courtland and the nurse exchanged meaningful glances.

"Now look here!" began Courtland, with his engaging smile. "Why couldn't the nurse and I do all that's necessary? How about tomorrow afternoon? Could you get off awhile, Miss Wright? Miss Brentwood, you could tell the nurse just what you want done with your things, and I'll warrant she and I have sense enough to pack up one little room."

After some persuasion Bonnie half consented, and then they attended to the telegram.

> Your wonderful invitation accepted with deep gratitude. Will start as soon as able. Probably Wednesday night. Will write.

was what they finally evolved.

Courtland enjoyed sending that telegram. He enjoyed it so much that he sent another along with it on his own account, which read:

> Three cheers for the best mother in the United States! She's coming and you ought to see her eyes shine!

It was on the way back to the university that he happened to remember Gila's letter.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE very first line translated Courtland into another world from the one in which he had been living during the past three days. Its perfumed breath struck harshly on his soul.

> MY DEAR MR. COURTLAND: I am writing to report on the case of the poor girl whom you asked me to help. I was very anxious to please you and did my best; but you remember that I warned you that persons of that sort were likely to be most difficult and ungrateful—indeed, quite impossible sometimes. And so, perhaps, you will be somewhat prepared for the disappointing report I have to give.
> I went to the hospital this afternoon, putting off several engagements to do so. I was quite surprised to find the girl in a private room, but of course your kindness made that possible for her, which makes her utter ingratitude all the more unpardonable.
> But I found her quite sullen and disagreeable. She wouldn't look at the things I had brought although I suggested several ways in which I intended to help her and make it possible for her to have a few friends of her own class who would make her forget her troubles. She just lay and stared at me and said, quite impertinently, that she didn't remember ever having met me. And when I mentioned your name she denied ever having seen you. She even dared to ask me to leave the room. And the nurse was most insulting.
> But don't worry about it in the least, for papa has promised to have the nurse removed at once from her position, and blacklisted, so that she can't ever get another place in a decent hospital.
> I am afraid you will be disappointed in your protégée, and I am awfully sorry, for I would have enjoyed doing her good; but you see how impossible it was.
> I'll be delighted to go slumming for you any time again that you say, and please don't mind asking me.
> My cousin has been telling me how you have been looking after some of the work of a student who is majoring in sociology, so I'm beginning to understand why you took this girl up. I do hope you'll let me help. Suppose you run over this evening and we can talk it over. I'm giving up two whole engagements to stay at home for you, so I hope you will properly appreciate it, and if anything hinders your coming, would you mind calling up and letting me know?
> Hoping to see you this evening,
> Your true friend and fellow worker,
> GILA DARE.

THE letter struck a false note in the harmony of the day. He could not understand why Gila had not had better discernment than to think Bonnie an object of charity. He hated to have his opinion of Gila shaken. The vision of her loveliness in rose and silver, with her prayer-book "in her kerchief" was still dimly forcing him to be at least polite and accept her letter of apology for her failure, as he could but suppose it was sincerely meant.

Then all at once a new fact dawned upon him. The invitation had been for Saturday evening! This was Sunday evening! And now what was he to do?

He went to the telephone as soon as he reached the college. The fellows had already gone down to the evening meal. He could hear the clink of china and silver in the distant dining-room. It was a good time to 'phone.

A moment, and Gila's cool contralto answered.

"This is Paul Courtland!"

"Oh, Mr. Courtland!" Her voice was freezing.

But Courtland was not used to being frozen out. "I owe you an apology, Miss Dare," he said, with dignity. He didn't care how blunt he sounded now. It always angered him to be frozen! "Your letter reached me just as I was leaving here last evening on a very important errand. I put it in my pocket, but I have been so occupied that it escaped my mind utterly until just now. I hope I did not cause you much inconvenience."

"Oh, it really didn't mattah in the least!" answered Gila, indifferently. Nothing could be colder or more distant than her tone, and yet there was something in it this time, a subtle lure, that exasperated.

"I really am awfully ashamed," he said, in quite a boyish, humble tone, and then gasped at himself. What was there about Gila that always "got a fellow's goat"?

AFTER that Gila had the conversation quite where she wanted it, and finally she told him sweetly that he might come over this evening if he chose. She had other engagements, but she would break them all for him.

"Suppose you go to church with me this evening," he temporized. "I've found a minister I'd like to have you hear. He's quite original!"

There was a distinct pause at the other end of the 'phone. Then she answered, in sweetly honeyed tones:

"Why, that would be lovely! Perhaps I will. What time do we start?"

Something in her tone annoyed him, despite his satisfaction at having induced her to be friends again. Almost it sounded like a false note in the day again. He hadn't expected her to go.

"I warn you that it is among very common people in the lower part of the city," he said, almost severely.

"Oh, that's all right!" she declared, graciously. "I'm sure it will be dandy! I certainly do enjoy new experiences!"

He hung up the 'phone with far greater misgivings than he had felt when he asked her to call on Bonnie.

While he was gone to church Tennelly and Bill Ward were earnestly discussing him.

"We can't have a fellow like Court spoiled for life. He's gone stale, that's what's the matter; he's gone stale! He's got to have strenuous measures to pull him up," said Tennelly thoughtfully.

"He sure has!" said Bill Ward, soberly. "What can we do? What about these business ambitions of his? Couldn't we work him that way? For Court's got a great head on him, you know! And not even Court could mix business and religion, for they won't fit together!"

"That's the trouble," said Tennelly, thoughtfully. "If it get's out what's the matter with Court he won't stand half a chance. I was thinking of my uncle Ramsey, out in Chicago. He has large financial interests in the West; he often wants promising men to take charge of some big thing, and it means a dandy opening; big money and no end of social and political pull to get into one of his berths. He's promised me one when I'm done college, and I was going to talk to him about Court. He's twice the man I am and just what Uncle Ramsey wants. He's coming on East next week, and likely to stop over. I might see what I can do."

"That's just the thing, 'Nelly. Go to it, old man! Write unc. a letter tonight. Nothing like giving a lot of dope beforehand."

"That's an idea! I will!" and Tennelly went to his desk and began to write.

Meantime Gila awaited Courtland's coming, attired in a most startling costume of blue velvet and ermine, with high-laced white kid boots, and a hat that resembled a fresh white setting hen, tied down to her pert little face with a veil whose large-meshed surface was broken by a single design, a large black butterfly anchored just across her dainty little nose. A most astonishing costume in which to appear in the Rev. John Burns's unpretentious little church crowded with the canaille of the city!

It was the first time that Courtland had ever felt that Gila was a little loud in her dress!

MOHAMMEDANS in Egypt are "listening in." The attendance is steadily increasing and one Sunday four Mohammedan professors were at the preaching service and fifteen Mohammedan boys came to the Sunday school for the first time. Their fathers stood outside the windows to ascertain what the teaching might be. A number of them were thus listening out of doors.

Which Road Is Yours?

An Earth Road which requires at least a 218-pound pull to each ton

A Concrete Road which requires an average pull of only 27.6 pounds to each ton

IT takes a pull of 218 pounds to get a 1-ton load over the road on the left, when you can get over it at all. In wet weather you can't get over it at all; even in dry weather it is rough and dusty. On the right, where the road has been paved with concrete, it takes a pull of only 27.6 pounds. It never takes more than that in the worst kind of weather—winter or summer—because it is hard and clean.

Which Road Do You Want?

Everybody knows that it is easier to haul on a concrete road than on any less rigid surface. But few realize how great is the difference. This has been recently determined by tests made with a dynamometer by Prof. J. B. Davidson, Agricultural Engineer, University of California, made for the Good Roads Bureau of the California State Automobile Association.

A 3-ton load was hauled over various types of roads in the same locality on the same day, the same horses and drivers being used. The dynamometer recorded tractive pull in pounds per ton of load as follows:

	Pounds
Over a level, unsurfaced concrete road	27.6
Concrete base, ⅜-inch skin top asphaltic oil and screenings	49.2
Waterbound macadam, level, good condition	64.3
Concrete base, 1½-inch Topeka top, level, good condition	68.5
Gravel road, good condition, level.	78.2
Earth road, fine dust, level	92
Earth road, stiff mud on top, firm underneath, level	218
Loose gravel, not packed down, new road, level	263

Remarkable showing for concrete—less than half the tractive force required over a good stretch of waterbound macadam, less than one-third that required on dirt or packed gravel, about one-tenth the pull required on loose gravel.

You pull ON a concrete road, where you pull AGAINST an unimproved, rough or boggy surface. Where one wastes power, the other saves. Power costs money, whether you feed a team or buy gasoline. Your saving in power will pay your share of the cost of a concrete road.

There are 30,000,000 horse-drawn vehicles in this country, most of them on farms, and 3,500,000 motor cars and trucks. The waste of horse power, of time, and motor fuel involved, not in poor roads, but in all roads less desirable for traction than concrete, is enormous. Besides this waste, the United States Office of Public Roads estimates that $200,000,000 per year is paid out indirectly for bad roads in extra cost of food. What is paid out for maintenance of roads that won't stay built is incalculable. It runs into hundreds of millions more. The excess consumption of gasoline is another huge item which motor car owners have to pay.

Can any community afford to neglect its highways in view of these facts, or to build them of any material less enduring or less desirable for traction than CONCRETE? Its construction cost is lowest in the end and its upkeep cost is lowest from the start.

Be sure you know what a concrete road is. Concrete is made of portland cement, sand and pebbles or crushed stone, and water. It is hard and durable. Concrete is the material used in dams, factories, bridges and big engineering works like the Panama Canal, requiring great solidity and strength.

Let us give you some interesting figures. Write for free copies of Bulletins Nos. 107 and 136.

Concrete Roads
Their Advantages:
- No Mud—No Dust
- No Ruts—No Holes
- No Slipping
- No Skidding
- Easy Hauling
- Smooth Riding
- Long Life—Safety
- Always Ready for Use
- Low Maintenance
- Moderate Cost

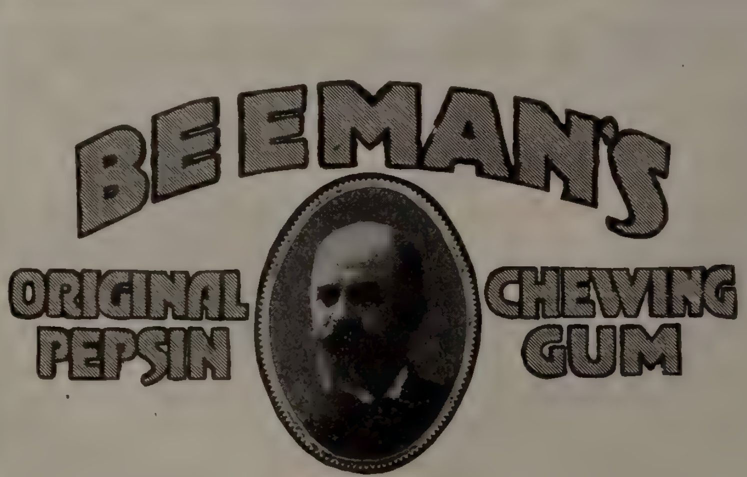
CONCRETE FOR PERMANENCE



MY GUM IS GOOD FOR A HEADACHE

Indigestion is prevalent. Indigestion causes suffering. Indigestion induces headaches and dizziness. 40% of all ills can be traced to indigestion.

Thousands of physicians knew this years ago. But I was the first to produce a chewing gum expressly to bring relief from ills of the stomach.

I devised a scientific formula for gum, as a food chemist.

Multitudes now use my gum to ward off headaches and troubles of the stomach.

Seeking Worthwhile Things

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Prov. 8 : 10–21; Matt. 6 : 33

THE Word says, all these things shall be added unto you if ye seek righteousness first. A great many people have made the mistake of seeking the things first. When the writer was in college a young man told him that he intended to be a Christian some day but that he was going to "make his pile first," because he couldn't get rich and be a Christian too, and he said he wouldn't join the church and do things which he knew were not right, for he was no hypocrite. This boy is more or less typical of many hundreds who are firmly convinced that success must always be tainted with untruth, and that every man who succeeds must necessarily be well provided with a closet for skeletons, a weird chamber in his memory from which phantoms will arise at times to challenge his better self, to tarnish his gold, to dim his gems and to threaten the whole foundation of his structure of fame and position.

This ought not to be. Success in earthly things may be purchased at too great a price, and after all it is not worth while merely for itself. The lives of men such as Sir George Williams, John S. Huyler, Henry Clay Trumbull, and such patriots as Henry Clay and Abraham Lincoln are sufficient evidences that the path of strict integrity and loyalty to truth and to Christ is also the sure way to success in earthly things. But however much or little a man may have if he but serve God faithfully and his fellow men as well, whatever he has will be doubly blessed by the contentment of mind which will be his. But God has said through the writer of Proverbs, "I lead in the way of righteousness . . . that I may cause those that love me to inherit substance, and I will fill their treasuries." He has said all of these things will be added unto us if we but put righteousness first, and His word is true and the proof thereof abundant.

Taking Men Alive

Epworth League Topic. Luke 5 : 10; Matt. 4 : 18–20; Acts 8 : 27–36; II. Tim. 2 : 26

THE boy who expects to go fishing is usually very busy on the previous evening, about sunset, digging bait. The only fish that can be caught without bait are not worth having. It is much the same in fishing for men on Sunday or any other day. Some time must be spent in digging bait, in other words in making ready for the great game. The best bait for taking men alive is the bait of friendship, of true friendship undiluted with patronage and untinged with the slightest stain of self-interest. It is said that when Jesus looked upon the rich young man, he loved him, not for his wealth but for the nobility of character which he saw behind that wealth. We can only win men if we have this Christlike love for them. Organization is good, but it only wins men when it is cemented together and impelled by love. Comradeship, the glad hand, the official welcome of our church, often repel because of their insincerity, because the motive back of them is a desire to do our "duty," however difficult. The best place to dig bait for men is on one's knees. If we stay face to face with Christ in prayer till he has purged from our hearts all self-seeking, all class consciousness and all pride of position, and has filled us with an unfeigned love for men because they are men and because he loved them, we will be fitted to take alive every man whom we touch. And this includes our chum, for no one sees our shallowness and pettiness more clearly than this best friend, who may perhaps be being kept out of the kingdom by these very things.

take the Testaments, reminding them of certain sayings which they must not forget if they are true to the Book, thus evidencing the large degree to which leaven of truth from the little Testaments is spreading in the tents. It is not exactly easy for a man to be a Christian in the army. Banter and ridicule are sure to be his daily portion, but if he stands true—as thousands of them do—the banter, while no less in volume, will be merely one way of paying tribute to the steadfastness of a comrade's faith.

ONE man approached the counter in one of the big tents one day. He was a Southerner and so was the secretary. From this point of contact sprang a conversation which gave the secretary an opportunity to offer the man one of the little khaki-bound Testaments. The man replied, "You wouldn't offer me that book if you knew as much as I do about myself." The secretary opened the book and showed him the verse which says, "Whosoever will," and the man went away with tears in his eyes and the Testament in his pocket.

While the writer was standing back of one of the counters, playing secretary for a little while, a man came up looking very lonesome and cold and downcast. The writer asked him if he was cold or if he only looked cold, and he smiled and said, "No, but I haven't got anything to do." A little further conversation developed the fact that the boy had come from a town in which the writer once lived and there were common acquaintances. Soon the downcast look was gone and the boy was warmed in body because his heart had been warmed by comradeship. Instances like this happen day after day across the counters in the big white tents, or in the huts which displace the tents in the permanent camps. There flow steady streams of mutual Christian brotherliness. There is no cant, no surveillance, no air of superior wisdom or of untouchable holiness, for the men in khaki and the men in olive drab with the red triangle on their sleeves are brothers and comrades, and the men in khaki often salute the men with the red triangle even as they salute their officers, for they say they deserve it.

There is absolutely no greatness in life without service—only those who serve are great. If the spring gave out no sparkling water it would soon vanish, and even the frogs would hop croakingly away.

Producers and Consumers in National Convention

By CONGRESSMAN JOHN M. BAER

A HISTORIC meeting was held in St. Paul, Minn., on September 18–21, the purposes and results of which have been widely misrepresented. From sixteen states of the Union came thousands of farmers and from eleven different states thousands of representatives of labor organizations poured forth, like the Crusaders of old, with St. Paul as their Mecca, in response to the call of the National Nonpartisan League for a National Conference of Producers and Consumers to consider the best methods to combat that ancient enemy of the people, General High-Cost-of-Living.

The principal speakers at the series of meetings included A. C. Townley, president of the National Nonpartisan League, Governor Lynn J. Frazier of North Dakota, Senators La Follette and Borah, Congressmen Young and Baer of North Dakota, ex-Congressman Lindberg of Minnesota, Mayor Van Lear of Minneapolis, Benjamin C. Marsh of New York, Messrs. Colver, Thompson and others.

Contrary to some reports, the addresses at the meeting and the sentiments expressed by those in attendance were characterized by a marked degree of patriotic fervor. A brief synopsis of the resolutions, unanimously adopted, shows the following salient points:

The government is urged to fix prices on all necessaries of life, and if this does not effectually reduce the price of flour and bread, government commandeering of elevators, flour mills and bakeries is urged.

War profits should be used to pay the expenses of the war; the income tax should be stiffened and a tax should be placed on the value of unused land.

Public ownership of public utilities is endorsed. The government is urged to take over the operation of Montana mines and other industries when labor troubles cannot be settled speedily.

Pay of $50 per month, protection from foreclosure of mortgages, and cheap life insurance are urged for soldiers.

The government is asked to provide loans at low rates of interest for farmers in drought-stricken sections.

The government is asked to buy its grain direct instead of through brokers.

The government is asked to establish the milling value of wheat as the basic test for grade and price.

The government is thanked for announcing its war aims in response to the peace note of Pope Benedict, and is informed that all further efforts of this country and the Entente Allies along the lines indicated in the reply will be supported.

THESE resolutions are the result of two days' study by a committee composed of representatives of every farmers' organization and every labor organization represented at the convention. The committee was not chosen by the chairman of the convention, but was selected by the delegates themselves, each organization represented furnishing its own man, therefore each member of the committee had ideas of his own. In addition the committee had the views of some of the ablest men in the United States to aid them in their problem of formulating resolutions which should express the sentiments of those in attendance upon the convention. The members of the committee encouraged one another to state individual opinions, and worked until a finished program was evolved, which they felt embodied the best in all the ideas presented. This program, or set of resolutions, was presented to the members of the great convention, by whom it was received with cheers and adopted by unanimous vote. On this program the producers and consumers present expressed their intention to cooperate.

The basic theory of the program is that: 1. The people constitute the government; 2. The government should be operated for the benefit of the people. If so operated, the people will wholeheartedly give the government their support. Their support is needed today more than at any other time in the history of the nation.

The resolutions also include the statement that: "We pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor to our country and our flag, in this, our war."

A PRELIMINARY meeting, largely attended, was held in Fargo, N. D., on September 18, but interest centered in the "Big Convention" which opened in St. Paul on September 19. The morning session was attended by a crowd numbering between 1,500 and 1,800 persons. Governor Frazier of North Dakota acted as temporary chairman, and the convention opened by the singing of "America" by the delegates, accompanied by the Minnesota State Band. Later the permanent organization of the convention was announced, with Governor Frazier of North Dakota as chairman, Joseph Gilbert of St. Paul vice-chairman, and Norbert O'Leary of St. Paul secretary.

The convention was welcomed to the city by Mayor V. R. Irwin of St. Paul, who was followed by Governor Frazier in a brief address outlining the purpose of the gathering. Governor Frazier said: "This convention was called for producers and consumers. We all are consumers, and we all should be producers. This is not a protest meeting, but a get-together meeting. No question arises of the patriotism of labor and of the tiller of the soil."

The Governor dwelt briefly on the result to the farmer of price-fixing on his products, and urged that the government, having fixed the price on wheat, which was accepted by the farmers, continue until the price is fixed on all of the necessaries of life.

George W. Lawson, secretary of the St. Paul Trades and Labor Assembly, emphasized the manner in which the farmer and the laborer in other lines of productive work have been separated by those who have worked against the interests of both. He said: "The farmer has for years been played against the workingman, and the workingman against the farmer. We have not gained what we should. But our aims are to a large extent identical. The laborer is looking for a better day tomorrow than today has been, and that is what the farmer wants too. We should work together."

THE feature of the afternoon meeting was the address by A. C. Townley, president of the National Nonpartisan League. He spoke for nearly three hours to an audience which followed his words with closest attention, and applauded to the echo every pointed statement. Mr. Townley opened his remarks by saying:

"We live in a democracy. In a democracy the law of the land is the will of a majority. In an autocracy the law of the land is the will of one man; and that is not the kind of a government we want.

"In a democracy, where the will of the majority is the law of the land, it is the duty of all people to abide by the will of the majority. Whether I think that law is right or wrong, it is my duty to obey that law.

"I am going with the majority of the American people wherever they want to go, but I'm going to talk with them on the way. Just as much as it is my duty to abide by the will of the majority, it is my duty to help mold the will of the majority.

"And just as much as it is the duty of us all to abide by the will of the majority as expressed by the responsible heads of the government, so it is the duty of the heads of this nation to seek out the will of the majority—to find out what it is—and to stand by it."

Mr. Townley spoke at length relative to the hoarding of necessaries other than those produced by farmers, and made statements which were later confirmed in every detail by Mr. Ray Vance, one of the country's leading investigators of economic problems.

Mr. Townley made clear that the purpose of the convention was to support the government in a plan to carry to a logical conclusion the movement inaugurated by the establishment of a fixed price on the farmers' wheat, and which may be continued by placing a fair price on every article of human consumption. Such a procedure would relieve the nation of the burden of billions of dollars of war profits now being accumulated by evil speculators and profiteers.

INTERESTING addresses of great scientific and practical value were made by ex-Congressman Lindberg of Minnesota, Dr. E. F. Ladd, president of the North Dakota Agricultural College, and Robert Bridges of New York. Miss Jeannette Rankin, the first congresswoman to take a seat in the Congress of the United States, received a rousing ovation and was listened to with sympathetic interest and frequent applause, as she spoke of the problems of the Montana miners.

The attendance at the meetings increased hourly, until at the closing session the Auditorium held a closely packed crowd of between 14,000 and 15,000 persons, who listened with intense interest and rapt attention to the noted speakers, giving each one generous and vociferous applause.

Why a meeting of such broad and patriotic nature should have been singled out for denunciation and placed under the ban of suspicion as to its patriotic purpose and intent is not easy to understand. A few—very few—subsidized papers of the country have so misrepresented the purpose and proceedings of the convention as to convey the erroneous impression to their readers that the conference was a pro-German and anti-American demonstration. Fortunately, the number of persons reached by these papers is, by comparison, small, and the general effect of the meeting, in results accomplished and influence extended, cannot fail to bring great good to the American people.

Mothers' Club appealed to the principal of the school and induced him to organize a boys' club, known as the 'Court of Honor,' which should try all cases and give sentence for punishment.

"Attorneys were elected from among the members, for a period of one month. The principal presided as judge; and jurors were drawn for each session, which was twice a month. Each member was put on his honor to report all cases of misdemeanor committed by fellow members. Forms of punishment used were: suspension from school, class or court; removal from office, if an officer; loss of place on baseball or basketball teams and social isolation. That is: the offender was dropped by his associates for a time.

"As an incentive to the boys to become members, other activities were combined. Athletic, skating, camping and fishing clubs were given a place; also a debating team. To cover expenses of literature and lights for night meetings, an assessment of ten cents per month was made, to be paid from money earned by the boys themselves. Opportunities for earning were offered by the school and business men.

"Occasional entertainments were given and the boys were taught to enjoy the right kind of a good time by being shown how to have it. All except two of the youthful law-breakers bid fair to become useful citizens.

"With best wishes for 'Neighbors' everywhere, — — —."

This splendid letter is only a forerunner. Next week, the Department will be filled with such letters: stimulating challenges from women all over the country (North, South, East and West), who have solved one or more of the problems you and I, and your community and mine, are wrestling with. If one of these letters proves helpful, let us know so that we can pass on this good word to the writer of it. And, meantime, don't delay about sending in to the Department your own valuable "Adventures in Neighboring."

PROF. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

The Millennium

What, When and Where?

BY PROF. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

America's Great Prophetic Expositor
Dean of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago

Additional series of articles to appear in the

CHRISTIAN HERALD

"THE Mountain Peaks of Prophecy," Prof. Gray's first series of articles, which has just ended in the Christian Herald, has brought forth such a number of inquiries from students and Bible readers all over the country, that an additional series has become a necessity.

They will be contributions of the most valuable character to the prophetic literature of the times in which we are now living—a period which, in the opinion of all of the best Bible expositors, is one of prophetic fulfilment.

The new series by Dr. Gray will be closely linked in relation with "The Mountain Peaks" series just concluded, and will bear the following titles:

What Does the Bible Teach About Russia?
What Does the Bible Teach About the Restoration of Babylon?
The Millennium: What, When and Where?
The Present War and Coming Events

It will be seen at once by all who have the slightest acquaintance with prophecy, that these four topics are of the most vital interest to the generation now living. They should be read in conjunction with and as a continuation of the series just closed, but more especially of the last three articles in that series, namely:

The Place of the Church in the Plan of Redemption
The Antichrist, Who He is and When He Will Arise
"The Day of the Lord," When it Comes and What it Means

The three articles named above, together with the four additional new articles, will constitute a list of seven contributions in which the Bible searchlight is turned on the great prophetic mysteries and the spiritual interpretation applied by one of the greatest living expositors.

WHY 300,000 FAMILIES LOVE CHRISTIAN HERALD

THE Christian Herald is doing something more than merely placing interesting reading matter in the homes of its readers. It is giving them a part in great enterprises. It is giving them spiritual and material helpfulness. It is the one magazine that represents in the most vital way all of the interests of Protestant Christianity and of the on-marching church of Christ. Week by week, the Christian Herald is giving its readers issues of absorbing interest.

You should be a regular reader of the Christian Herald and enjoy these special features which are now appearing:

THE GREATER UNITED STATES. By Frank G. Carpenter.
VITAL HUMAN STORIES FROM RUSSIA. By Maynard Owen Williams.
DRAWINGS AND POEMS. By Robert Riggs and Margaret E. Sangster.

Nehemiah's Prayer

International Sunday School Lesson for November 11

Neh. 1:1-11

The Call of a Statesman

By Rev. George D. Allison

EVIDENTLY no great measure of prosperity succeeded Ezra's first efforts in Jerusalem. Religious conditions were improved and the aspirations of the people aroused; but there was a call for a powerful constructive genius, for some man who would do for the civic life what Ezra was doing for the Law of Jehovah. Once more God was calling, "Whom shall I send?" and this time his message reached a courtier in far-off Susa, the summer capital of the Persian kings. From the midst of a heathen court came one who had never even seen Jerusalem, to be its governor and its reconstructor.

It was the news of a frightful calamity that aroused this man. We know nothing of what had happened, but clearly it was something new and recent, for of course Nehemiah knew all about the fall of Jerusalem 150 years before. His family had been among the exiles then.

Our chapter is beautifully supplemented by the account in Josephus (Book 11, Ch. 5), which some of our teachers doubtless have. Here we read that Nehemiah was walking one day in the outskirts of Susa, when he heard some strangers speaking Hebrew and found among them his own brother Hanani. They told him of the sufferings of the enfeebled land of Judah, and the petty persecutions of their enemies because of the lack of defenses. "The roads were in the daytime found full of dead men."

Standing in sight of the mighty walls and temples of Susa, these patriotic Jews wept to think of their ruined fatherland, as thousands had done before and since. But Nehemiah did not stop with weeping. The quality of the man is indicated at once by his instinctive question: "What can I do?" To the weak and despairing misfortune brings only tears; but to the courageous and faithful, it brings challenge and opportunity and deeper searchings for God.

What could Nehemiah do a thousand miles away, a member of a subject race, a servant in the palace of a changeable and despotic monarch? In the first place, however, his position gave him direct access to the king if he were wise and discreet enough to know how to get results for his nation. The cupbearers were probably the channels of "backstairs diplomacy" in those ancient courts. While it is doubtful if the title is one of political importance, it is sure that those personal attendants were frequently the confidants of the rulers. If they were men of tact, they could accomplish big political results.

Doubtless Hanani had heard of his brother's position and was seeking him with a vague hope of help. But it was a risky adventure to intercede for Judah. It might instantly cost him his place and prospects, if not his life. The first test came in the willingness of Nehemiah's heart to take this chance, and if successful to give up influence and ease for a desert journey and a ruined province.

The Patriot

BUT this man was only waiting the challenge to spring to the aid of his country. He had in him that strange, powerful loyalty that we call patriotism.

And notice that Nehemiah was essentially a foreigner. Born far away, steeped in the traditions of a Persian court, using many foreign expressions and dates, he is nevertheless the typical patriot of the Old Testament. Patriotism consists not in externals; it is of the heart. Some of our grandest American patriots in this crisis were born across the sea, and even now speak English with an accent. When Teutonic spies are found and the German Empire is at war with us, let us not fail to notice that some of our truest citizens are of German blood. Some of our adopted citizens shame us by their enthusiasm for the ideals of our fathers. Did you read "The Promised Land" by Mary Antin, or any of the books of Professor Steiner, that Austrian Jew, Christian American, idealist?

The Man of Prayer

FOR Nehemiah reminds me of Steiner, man of religion and statesmanship combined. When Nehemiah the patriot was aroused, Nehemiah the man of prayer was revealed. First came the sob of grief, then the thrill of patriotic zeal to help, then a turning to God for guidance that was as instinctive as the sunflower turning to the sun. So we find at the beginning of these excerpts from Nehemiah's diary a typical prayer. It puts him in the succession of praying patriots that begins with Moses and David and includes William of Orange, Cromwell and George Washington.

Perhaps this is what distinguished those men and made them great. Many a patriot considered his country, but, like Hanani, stopped with the part that men had played in its downfall. For Nehemiah and the others God Almighty was concerned. The purposes of the Eternal are bound up in the doings of nations as well as of men. The stars in their courses fought against Sisera when he tried to obliterate Israel from the earth. So Lincoln believed that God was interested in the destiny of this Republic and the freeing of the slave.

Now that America is embarked upon her mission of vindication of the rights of humanity, we must pray and act that she may be true to her high calling and never fall into greed or hate or godlessness. Patriots, true patriots, let us be men of prayer as we face the problems of our times in the spirit of Nehemiah.

Prayer Language

WE know not how to pray as we ought. But we learn to pray best by praying. A neglected theme in Sunday school and church is the enrichment of prayer. Some grown people have never added to the few phrases of prayer that childhood gave them, like the man in the story who thought that "Now I lay me down to sleep" was the Lord's Prayer! Such a man is not a daily Bible reader, for the Book itself is the greatest source of prayer language in the world. You can see that in Nehemiah himself, whose sentences are full of quotations from the book of Deuteronomy. Some one has suggested that Deuteronomy may have been all the Bible he had, but that he certainly used it.

And Nehemiah found good even in Persia, for he uses several Persian expressions as well, like "the God of Heaven." He used his education in his worship, just as today we find rich, helpful words from Tennyson or Browning coming to our lips when we lead God's children in supplication. Culture is not essential to prayer, but it makes even prayer richer and more stimulating than before.

And Nehemiah's prayer is direct and personal and definite. He is not limited to any bookish praying. He asks God straight out to prosper him in the undertaking upon which he has resolved, and to grant him mercy in the sight of this man. The king of Babylon and Persia is only "this man" in prayer.

So we build up our prayer life from the Scriptures, from modern thought, from the emergencies of our own life, until we can be—if we will—mighty in prayer.

When patriots pray, they remember their country's shortcomings and confess the sins and evils that disgrace her banner. Prayerful patriots today implore divine aid against the foul blot of the drink traffic, which has already brought boys before a firing squad who started out to offer their lives for America. Patriotism must not shut our eyes to these things, nor to the shameless

"Limpy"—The Boy Who Felt Neglected

WHAT William Johnston has done in this story is to put on paper the soul of a boy of ten, who is just coming face to face with the truer values of life. No mean achievement is this, for it is a beautiful thing to look into the heart of a child and see what is hidden there.

We will send a copy of "Limpy" and the Christian Herald for one year (new or renewal) for....... $2.25

The Pictorial Life of Christ

Eighty Magnificent Sculptural Illustrations by the Famous Italian Master-Sculptor, DOMENICO MASTRIOANNI

THESE magnificent pictures are not paintings. They are something finer. The originals are combinations of sculpture and sculptural reliefs done in wax and clay and wonderfully grouped and photographed.

In simple, attractive language, the story of the life of Jesus is told by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd, who has adhered faithfully to the narrative in the Gospels. The binding is an extremely handsome design in white vellum with red and blue letters. Size, 7 x 10 inches.

We will send The Pictorial Life of Christ, and the Christian Herald for one year, for only............. $2.25

From Cocoanut-Land To You

With ALL the Flavor—But None of the Labor

That taste of freshly grated cocoanut, how delicious it is! To enjoy it, you no more have to grate the cocoanut yourself, than you have to travel over seas to the land where the cocoanut grows.

The Dromedary way picks your cocoanut for you, prepares it in unusually long, tender shreds full of flavor, packs it in a moisture-proof package, and guarantees its reaching you perfect. You have only to remove the cap from the round yellow package, and you have ready for instant use, a cocoanut that will go further and satisfy you better than any you have ever used.

The "Ever-Sealed" Package

An Economical Feature

No need to use all your Dromedary Cocoanut at once. Use what you need, then put back the cover that seals the round package and the cocoanut that is left keeps as fresh, moist, and full-flavored as when first grated. Not a shred is wasted.

So easy to use, so delicious, and of high food value, why not serve Dromedary Cocoanut dishes more often? Everyone loves them. A one-cake package of Dromedary Cocoanut with booklet, "40 Unique Dromedary Cocoanut Recipes," sent on receipt of only 5c.

HELP OUR BOYS AT THE FRONT

RARELY have the readers of the Christian Herald given more cordial and generous welcome to any movement for the spread of the Gospel than that presented by our Soldiers and Sailors Fund for supplying Testaments and the Christian Herald to our soldiers and sailors. Every mail brings added evidence of the deep and widespread interest in this timely work, which is hailed both as a patriotic and religious opportunity not to be missed.

Mrs. R. B. C. sends a check for $3 from the Missionary Society of the Presbyterian Church of Allendale, S. C., to be used in Testament distribution, accompanied by the wish that they could do much more. "I am so glad you are doing this for the soldier boys," writes Mrs. A. L. R., Abilene, Kan., who also sends a contribution, "and I pray that many of them may become Christians by having the Testaments and using them. The Christian Herald is always in the front in any good work." A lady in Shelburn, Ind., sends $4 "to pay for sending the Christian Herald and as many Testaments as you can for the soldiers. I hope it will be the means of doing much good." Mrs. M. H. A., Airlie, Oregon, sends $10 for Testaments and Heralds and adds, "This is a splendid idea and I trust much money may be forthcoming for so worthy an object." H. E. G., Newark, N. J., sends a contribution with this comment: "Just a little bit, but prayers go with it that it may help to do a lot of good." Mrs. S. J. C., Springfield, N. Y., sends the "widow's mite," hoping that it may be "the means of saving some precious soul." A. J. S., Cherokee, N. C., sends $5 to be used for Bibles and Testaments. She prays that she may get in touch with them and "be able to do much more than simply send them a Testament." Mrs. Maggie D. and J. O. Long, evangelists, Harrisonburg, Va., send a joint gift of $4 "in His Name," to purchase Testaments with the devout prayer that they may "help somebody nearer to the Kingdom." Mrs. R. H. W., Westbrook, Me., sends $5, the gift of a Sunday school class, who read in the Christian Herald of the soldiers' and sailors' need of Testaments and brought their pennies every Sunday for several weeks to give for that purpose. With this beautiful gift comes the prayer that "God may bless the reading of them to their good." Miss A. C. C., Pasadena, Calif., contributes $5 to send the Christian Herald to the soldiers and sailors, and writes, "I have no doubt the young men in our navy and army will find the paper most interesting and enjoyable and I want to help the good cause along."

greed of profit-seekers who fatten on the world's agony and need.

Nehemiah confessed Israel's sins, but was unshaken in his conviction that God had a work for Israel to do. So we can feel about the United States. Nehemiah was resolute in his determination to serve his people and to vindicate Israel's confidence in God.

The Man of Courage

ALREADY he had a plan. This he never faltered in until he had completed his work. It called for courage at every step. First, to beard the king with a proposal to rebuild Jerusalem, and then to face the task of getting materials and workmen, overcoming obstacles, fighting enemies, holding the crowd to their duties. Far different from bringing in the king's wine and composing flattering speeches! But how much more of a man's job!

So Nehemiah found himself. The challenge of the world's need comes to us today above the tumult of war. God grant that many of our soldiers and sailors may achieve triumphant manhood through it all, and that thousands of those who have been sitting idle in church may become towers of spiritual strength in prayer and service. This has happened already abroad. Wicked, hateful war has only made real Christians more glorious. What sacrifices, what faithfulness unto death, what self-forgetfulness, have been theirs! Our Christian young people have their chance to enroll in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews.

The Honor Roll

EVERY Bible school should put Christian patriotism to the front in these strenuous days. Display the Honor Roll of the boys and men who are now enlisted. Keep in touch with these representatives with letters and packages from the church. Let no one come before the church in ministering to their needs.

Like Nehemiah we have heard the cry of ruined cities, and like him we must surrender ease and safety in order that we may serve. God calls us.

The Power of a Birthday Remembrance

TO remember one on a birthday, scholar or teacher, goes a long way in winning interest. "We must reach if we would teach."

For many years, it has been our practice to remember every scholar, Cradle Roll, Home Department and all other departments, by a birthday letter or card or both. These messages are usually signed by the superintendent of the school and the department superintendent.

These messages have been welcomed and treasured, often for years. The birthdays are kept on cards by the months. A birthday secretary can easily care for this in any school. In a small school the birthday greetings can be written by hand, while in a large school they can be typewritten or mimeographed.

I know of a busy banker in New York City who nearly every day dictates special messages to the scholars whose birthdays are occurring and signs them as a part of his daily mail. Can you think that such a message from one of New York's busiest men is ever forgotten?

May I give here one of our school birthday letters to the Senior scholars? The letters are of course different in each department, so that a brother and sister in a family would not receive the same letter.

> DEAR FRIEND: I am very glad for the opportunity of wishing you a happy birthday and a bright New Year.
> Every birthday now lifts you to a plane from which you can see more clearly the broad sweep of life, filled with purpose and opportunity, and the necessity of a true Guide through the years. There is one path that is sure. There are many that are inviting but that issue in wreck and sorrow. There is a Guide-Book that has never failed a traveler.
> Shall you this year follow very closely your Friend and Guide? As you keep close to him the joy of his companionship is such that we forget any weariness or discouragement of the journey; and in doing his errands, the years flit swiftly and gladly by.
> May the presence of your Guide help to make each succeeding day a better one until you shall stand with him in the city "whose builder and maker is God."
> I trust that you have enjoyed the association of the school during the past year. As you give your whole-hearted interest in attendance and study and participation in the exercises, will the school be a blessing to you and you to it.

The teacher can remember the scholars' birthdays even if the school does not do it. This gives him or her a great chance to come close to the scholar's heart. A sixteen-year-old boy had received such a message from his teacher. In it she had suggested what a splendid time it was on that birthday, for him to choose definitely to link up with Jesus Christ as his Saviour and Lord. The boy took the letter to his mother and told her he would do as his teacher suggested, and a new life for Christ began on that birthday.

For thirty years I have been remembering the teachers and officers of my school with personally written letters. This means over 200 such letters annually. Into these letters I put my heart. I have reason to know that they are expected and kept. Woe to me if I happen to overlook a name through accident. One man said to me: "Mr. Brown, I appreciate that remembrance. For years I was with another school and no one thought of me. If I can do anything to show my appreciation I shall be glad to respond." Usually I send some leaflet or booklet with the letter to build up the spiritual life of the worker.

For years we printed annually the names and birthdays of the teachers, with the request that the workers make a circle of prayer about each teacher as the birthdays came. This bond was a very precious one.

I count this factor of birthday remembrance one of great importance in school upbuilding. Certainly it promotes a feeling of family interest that makes for unity and strength.

Forms of Address for Soldiers' Mail

CORRECT forms for addressing mail to soldiers of the National Army, the National Guard, and the Regular Army as indicated by the Post Office Department:

For the Regular Army:

Private John Smith.
Company A, 64th Infantry,
Camp Lee, Virginia.

For the National Guard:

Private John Smith.
Co. B, 151st Inf. (69th N.Y.),
Camp Lee, Virginia.

For the National Army:

Private John Smith,
Co. C, 310th Inf. (N. J.),
Camp Lee, Virginia.

Unless addressed to company and regiment, mail will be delayed and probably returned to writer as undeliverable. The designations in parentheses following the regimental number are used in the case of National Guard and National Army men to indicate the state from which the organization (or the bulk of it) was drawn. Each letter and parcel should bear, also, the name and address of the sender.

The Post Office Department announces that Christmas packages must be in the mails by November 15.

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

"BUT the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him . . . to such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them."

If we would claim the mercy of God we must "remember his commandments to do them." We climb toward the answers to our prayers on a stairway which we build. We reach the answer when our feet are firmly planted on the pinnacle of faithful performance of his will. If we have failed, if we have fallen short, then our prayer should be for forgiveness and the cleansing of our hearts. This we can claim as sinners for whom Christ died. And being forgiven, we can again assail the heights of virtue and unselfish service—heights that are made glorious by the light of answered prayer.

L. B. S. praises God for the recovery of her sister from tuberculosis after her physician and friends had at one time given her up; and the two sisters join in a request for prayer for the restoration of their dear mother.

We do not know what blessing impelled the giving of the two mites by the widow whose gift received the approbation of the Lord; but A. B. sends one dollar "In His Name" as a thank-offering for restored health, asking that it go to feed some hungry one.

Mrs. G. W. M., whose son, her only support, wishes to leave the old home to embark in business, asks the League to pray that he may be divinely guided in the investment of her funds and in the setting up of a home for himself and his mother. She asks prayers for another son who is at a naval training station, that he may be protected in his spiritual life and return home. She also gives thanks for answers to prayers for improved conditions in the government of her state.

A. M. A. promised the Lord four or five years ago that if a certain prayer was answered she would acknowledge it in the Answered Prayer Column. The prayer was answered, but she failed to keep her promise; and now, repentant, she seeks pardon and an unburdened conscience by acknowledgment of the answered prayer and confession of her fault.

Mrs. E. S. A., a widow with small means, asks the prayers of the League for relief in grievous financial troubles.

Prayer is asked for a revival of religion at White Haven, Md. (at Trinity M. E. Church).

Mrs. A. M. K. asks prayer that a friend's sight may be restored; four friends, that sight may be strengthened.

A. C. H., that son's hearing may be restored; A. S. G., that hearing may be restored.

Four friends ask prayer for special blessing for others, including Mrs. W. F. T., that God may be very near to the soldier and sailor boys of our country and their mothers, relatives and friends at this trying time.

Twenty ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. E. A. B. and A Believer ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. S. M., that two nephews may be cured of the liquor habit; three wives ask prayer that husbands may be cured of the liquor habit.

Seventeen friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives; S. R., that sister may be cured of cancer; Mrs. P. M. H., that mother may be restored to health and strength; twenty, for the healing of self.

Six parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including Father and Mother, that two sons may be saved and return safely home from France; six wives, their husbands; eleven, other relatives and friends.

Fifteen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. L. P., Columbia Cross Roads, Pa.; C. C., Santa Rosa, Calif.; Mrs. A. G., Eston, Saskatchewan, Canada; A. M. S., Fayette, Ala.; Mrs. A. W., Madison, Me.; Mrs. T. S., Lincolnville, Kan.; C. C., Crete, Neb.

Bible Students and Christian Workers

Do you know your Bible? Do you feel the need of a more thorough, practical working knowledge of the Word of God? Are you awake to the means of securing it economically while engaged in your usual occupation? This means is by correspondence.

Correspondence Bible Study

Read What a Few of Our Students Say

This course has been a great spiritual uplift and blessing to me. I wish the blessing of God on The Moody Bible Institute.

A New York State Student

I have noticed a big improvement in my church work since I began the course, especially in the Sunday School and Christian Endeavor work.

A Michigan Student

What marvelous light I have received through these lessons! Long, long years I pondered over things in the precious Book that I now understand. A Tennessee Student

I enjoy the work very much and am getting more out of it than any Bible study I have ever pursued, not excepting my work in college.

An Ohio Minister

It may give you pleasure to know that I have won two souls to Christ with the help of the last lesson, and the lessons that deal with Christian Science.

An Illinois Student

I have been brought up to read the Bible but have never grasped its full meaning as I have been able to do in this course in some measure. I count the privilege a wonderful one.

A Pittsburgh Student

In my nine years of active ministry, I have never received such help from anything as from these studies. What a blessing it would be if our younger ministers would realize this and take such studies for their personal growth spiritually, and as an inspiration in the work in the pulpit and elsewhere.

A Nebraska Minister

For all unable to attend a Bible Institute, correspondence Bible study is a practical, efficient and economical method of securing a deeper, clearer knowledge of the Bible. Over 5000 students in all parts of the world last year studied one or more of our courses. Thousands of Christian people will this year begin correspondence study for the first time. Will you be one of them?

Make Our Motto Your Motto

> "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." 2 Timothy 2:15.

The Moody Bible Institute

has a fully equipped department, exclusively devoted to teaching by correspondence. You will be instructed by competent, practical Christian teachers. Our courses are thoroughly tested and popular. We have a course for everyone, young or old, beginner, student or instructor. Our aim is for careful business administration, most efficient teaching and courteous attention to all inquirers and students. We cannot urge too strongly all who wish a more thorough knowledge of God's Word to take up the work with us this season. rights of a nation that cannot enforce these rights by guns and military force, but it feels that its claim for respect is just as strong."

President Calls for Prayer. President Wilson on October 20 designated Sunday, October 28, as a day of prayer for the triumph of American arms. The proclamation was issued in accordance with a concurrent resolution adopted by both houses of Congress on the 4th of October. The proclamation was in part as follows:

"Whereas, it behooves a great free people, nurtured as we have been in the eternal principles of justice and of right, a nation which has sought from the earliest days of its existence to be obedient to the divine teachings, to turn always to the Supreme Master and cast themselves in faith at his feet, praying for his aid and succor in every hour of trial.

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, . . . do appoint October 28 . . . as a day of supplication and prayer for all the people of the nation, earnestly exhorting all my countrymen to observe the appointed day according to their several faiths, in solemn prayer that God's blessing may rest upon the high task which is laid upon us, to the end that the cause for which we give our lives and treasure may triumph and our efforts be blessed with high achievement."

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE whole of the past week mud—deep, slimy, sticky mud—has been supreme master of the British portion of the western front in Flanders, and as a result there have been no infantry actions in the Ypres salient of any moment. Nevertheless, the artillery fighting in this sector has continued with fluctuating violence, though always severe.

On the French portion of the western front, the artillery duel on the Chemin des Dames continued all the week, rising and falling in intensity. There were also a few rather unimportant infantry clashes at scattered points along this road. On the north front of Verdun, there have been a series of give-and-take infantry skirmishes between the French and the Germans, which have lasted the whole week. Greater animation than for a long period was shown during the last week on the Alsatian end of the western front. This fighting, however, while severe, was indecisive in its general results.

AERIAL activity on the western front was much greater than usual during the week. The British made constant attacks on the towns along the Belgian coast, the most notable being one on the docks at Bruges, in which over thirty machines participated and between six and seven tons of high explosives were rained on the town. The Germans made a large raid on the French town of Nancy in Lorraine, as a result of which there were numerous casualties, while the French attacked a couple of dozen points, principally railroad stations, factories and ammunition dumps, behind the German lines.

What little news has been received during the week, bearing on the internal conditions of Russia, tends to create the impression that the provisional government of Kerensky is gradually making itself master of the more radical elements of the Russian population. It would seem that the Workmen and Soldiers' Councils are slowly drifting away from the Bolsheviki—the fusion of the advanced radical parties—toward the Kerensky government. If this deduction is correct, the conference of the councils of the whole of Russia of this organization will either not be held at all, or will be much more moderate in its attitude than has heretofore been expected.

The military situation in Russia, however, is not improving. During the week the Germans have captured completely the Island of Oesel, at the entrance of the Gulf of Riga. Oesel is the largest of a group of islands which runs across the northern entrance of the Gulf of Riga, from northeast to southwest. To the north lies the second largest island of the group, Dago, while in the channel, between the eastern sides of Dago and Oesel and the mainland of Esthonia, are Worm and Moon islands. In the strait between Oesel and Dago, a fight took place between destroyer flotillas, in which the Russians report the Teutons lost two units and they themselves one.

On October 17 a naval battle took place at the southern entrance of Moon Sound, between the island of that name and the Esthonian coast. A Russian fleet of some twenty units was in Moon Sound under the protection of the shore batteries on the southern end of Moon Island. A German destroyer flotilla appearing in the offing, Russian light units moved out of the sound to attack it. A fight followed, in which the Russians were worsted. Seeing this, the Russian commander threw forward two battleships and a large cruiser to the support of the flotilla, whereupon the German destroyer screen dissolved and the rescuing Russians units found themselves in the presence of a formidable fleet of German battleships, which were greatly superior to the Russians and fought beyond the range of the Russian guns. In the fight which ensued, the Slava, a 14,000-ton battleship, was hit, and was sunk by her crew in an attempt to block the channel, and the two other Russian units were roughly handled. Thereafter the German fleet shelled the shore batteries, destroying them, and took up a position commanding the southern exit from Moon Sound, while another German fleet seized the northern exit.

The landing of the Germans on these islands, with its attendant possibility of extension to the mainland, made the position of the Russians at the naval base of Reval, at the entrance to the Gulf of Finland, exceedingly insecure, and the Kerensky government ordered the evacuation of the port. The schools were closed and the inhabitants were sent to the interior of Russia. It was also announced that the government considered Petrograd within the war zone and would shortly remove to the ancient capital of Moscow.

For the week ending October 14th the British admiralty reports the loss by mine or submarine of twelve vessels over 1,600 tons, and six of less tonnage. The Italian admiralty reports four steamers of over 1,500 tons sunk during the same period and the French one of more than and one of less than 1,600 tons.

On the Austro-Italian front, during the week, there were no important events, minor skirmishes and routine artillery duels being all that are reported.

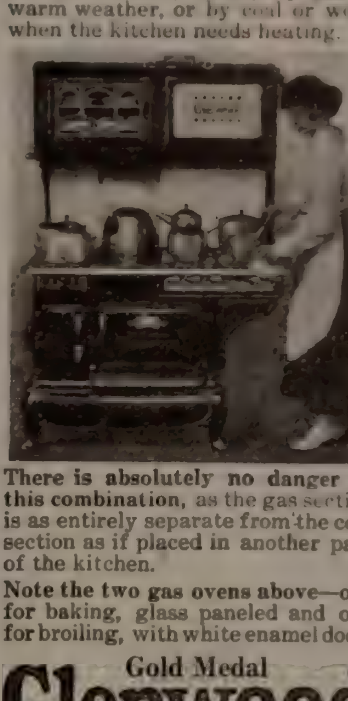
While the Mesopotamian and south Palestine fronts were very quiet all last week, there seems to be some reason to believe that the British are planning a vast enveloping movement of the Turkish positions in Palestine, with the design of forcing them to evacuate the Holy Land. As climatic and weather conditions are now and will be for the next few months favorable for this operation, there is a possibility that this movement will shortly take shape.

A fleet of Zeppelins raided England on the night of October 19. Eight of the raiders appeared over French territory on the following day and were attacked by airplanes and anti-aircraft guns. Five of them were brought down, but one succeeded in escaping after landing a part of its crew. Twenty-seven persons were killed and fifty-three injured by the bombs dropped in England.

Two German auxiliary cruisers, heavily armed, succeeded in eluding the British patrols in the North Sea and attacked, on October 20, a convoy of merchantmen under the protection of two British destroyers. Nine of the merchantmen and both of the destroyers were sunk. The raiders escaped. Five of the merchantmen sunk were Norwegian, one Danish and three Swedish. About 300 men of the crews were lost.

This New Range Is A Wonder For Cooking

Although it is less than four feet long it can do every kind of cooking for any ordinary family by gas in warm weather, or by coal or wood when the kitchen needs heating.



There is absolutely no danger in this combination, as the gas section is as entirely separate from the coal section as if placed in another part of the kitchen.

Note the two gas ovens above—one for baking, glass paneled and one for broiling, with white enamel door.

The Way Out

By
LOUIS E. ORCUTT

IS the cost of living making your income look like a fond memory of something that was and is not? Buy advertised goods. Why advertised goods? Because, with a market rising like dough with an extra allotment of yeast, package goods are acting like unleavened bread. Everything costs more in this fourth year of titanic struggle, but advertised package goods have risen least of all the things we buy. Why!

There are two reasons why advertised goods have gone up less than similar goods not advertised. In the first place, the manufacturer of an advertised product has his whole investment tied up in the success of that article. In many cases his advertising has established a price, and that price stands for value in the minds of thousands of users. When the advertiser changes the price he is practically offering a new article, and a large part of the structure of his business requires immediate rebuilding. Again, the advertising manufacturer has established a definite quality. He cannot vary that quality without risking the loss of every penny invested in the confidence of the people, who now feel safe in sending the smallest child to the store for a recognized brand of goods. A single lowering of the standard for even a fraction of his output will inevitably start a whisper going among the trade. Woman will say to woman, "Have you noticed how much poorer Blank's goods are lately?" and a business that mounted into millions will shrink into hundreds before the blasting breath of that whisper. It's too big a risk, and the manufacturer, whose market has been created through the printed page, will effect economies that he thought impossible, will scour the world for material to maintain his values, will reduce and then still further reduce his margin of profit, will even do business at a loss for a season rather than increase the price or lower the quality of the article that bears his name. He looks ahead to the years of plenty when the market will be easier, and when his public, built up at such a cost through the pages of the press, will stick to his goods because he stuck to his guns under fire.

THE manufacturer who does not advertise, on the other hand, has no other restraining influence than that subtle influence of competition, modified by his idea of what he can get away with. There is hardly anything that enters into trade today that cannot be skimped or modified or compounded from substitutes, or otherwise made something else while it seems to be itself. Woolen goods can be mixed with mercerized cotton; silk can be similarly adulterated. Fabrics that have been woven only from long-fiber yarns may use a shorter fiber; they'll look the same to the uninitiated, but they won't wear the same. Canners of foods can reject a few less of the undersized and overripened vegetables and fruits. Clothing-makers can use lighter weight fabrics, and can set their machines for a longer stitch, and can use lighter thread, or cotton in place of silk, in the seams. Shoemakers can use lighter weight leathers, or some leather substitute that has no reputation to lose, and they too can skimp on stitches and thread and linings. Refiners of sugars can stop a degree short of pure whiteness, and refiners of oils can omit the final careful separation of volatile substances which gives perfect, trouble-proof gasoline and kerosene. All these things and a lot more can be done if there is no reputation to be maintained. If persistent slighting of the product results in one brand selling off, it costs little to change brands and employ smooth salesmen to go out and unload them on the trade, where they stay on the shelves while fresher advertised goods sell out. A pretty label will often make the first sale and sometimes a second, but it takes real quality under the label to keep business and attract more. Thus the manufacturer who has nothing at stake but his profit is much more liable to yield to the pressure of rising material costs, and to cheapen his product, or reduce the quantity, than the manufacturer who has, at much cost and by arduous endeavor, established a business in a certain sized package at a certain price.

THEREFORE the consumer will find advertised goods one basis of safety in this swirling sea of rising prices. But, after all, advertised goods make up only a bare half of the things we buy—perhaps it would be better to say of the things we pay for, for we buy many kinds of package goods at low prices and pay a good round sum for some few that are seldom advertised, such as potatoes and coal. What is to be our protection against high prices in unadvertised goods sold usually in large quantities? The Government Food Commission, plus organization at home, appears to be the answer.

A few days ago the writer was talking with a member of the great organization that Uncle Sam has put under Mr. Hoover's direction. He asked this man what the commission intended to do about retail food prices. The answer was that they could do nothing; that the cost of getting materials to different local points was so varied, and the local selling cost also, and the number of local dealers so large, that no fair retail price could be fixed or enforced by the commission except on a very few bulky articles. It was his opinion that the remedy lay with the consumer. He advised the organization of Consumers' Leagues in every trading center. He said such a league could find out the cost of any article to the merchant, for the commission would gradually get the manufacturing and whosesale prices fixed; that the league could easily find out the cost of laying the article down in its community, and that it could then estimate what ought to be a fair retail price and advise its members to refuse to pay more. Then, if the local merchants failed to meet the scale thus fixed, the league could start a co-operative store and supply its members. The commission, however, the writer understood, would prefer that the business of distribution should remain in present hands, but with such shortening of the line of communication between producer and consumer as may be in the interest of all.

There is this to be said for the merchants. In most cases they are asked to carry too large credits and to carry them too long. Any account that stands on a merchant's books longer than thirty days should be charged interest, or be closed with an interest-bearing note. In most cases also they are forced to maintain expensive delivery systems and are asked to deliver many packages which could easily have been carried home by the purchaser. In many cases the time of clerks is wasted by thoughtless shoppers who take a dollar's worth of time to make a fifty-cent purchase. There can be little excuse for finickyness, or for the asking of more than the usual service in these days, and the true patriot will carry his or her packages and pay cash.

HERE, then, seems to be the formula by which the consumer may hope to combat the mounting cost of living. First, careful buying and as little demand for unpaid service as possible. Second, organization, plus cooperation if necessary, and third and last, but first in real effectiveness, selection of advertised merchandise wherever there is a choice between the known and the unknown. Added to all of these, and affecting all, may be added the Food Commission's urgent call to the nation to use sparingly and not to waste. Make every penny buy all it will, and then make the purchase serve its full quota. Buy carefully and avoid waste.

Among the Workers

THE North Siam News tells of the good Gospel work of a missionary automobile. The native people are giving it a cordial welcome. More than twenty carpenters donated their labor to build a garage. In several districts the Christians volunteered to repair the roads leading to their villages. Sunday the car carried two American missionaries and three native pastors to their waiting congregations. The man who stood guard over the car during the services improved the time by placing two hundred and one portions of Scripture in the hands of non-Christian readers.

A CHAPTER on the life of the late Dr. George W. Bailey, president of the World's Sunday School Association, has been added to the book "Their Call to Service," by Philip E. Howard, of the Sunday School Times. This book is issued by the Westminster Press. A picture of Dr. Bailey has been placed in this special edition and the book will be read and treasured by the many Sunday school workers who have known and been influenced by this great leader in winning the young to their Saviour. His self-chosen epitaph is "He loved little children."

EARLY to rise on Sunday may work in Japan but it is not the American fashion. A missionary in Japan, in a letter to the World's Sunday School Association, said, in part: "The primary school children near here have to be at school at five Sunday morning, so they will learn not to be sleepy-heads! As they keep the children there at school for only twenty minutes or so, the children are soon ready for the next thing that offers. Some go home for breakfast, but last week a lot of the big boys were at the gates at 5:30 begging to be let in; but if let in they would tear things up at great rate unless a teacher is there to look after them. We've been beginning Sunday school at 8 A.M. for some time, but from to-morrow we start in much earlier. So on Sunday morning when you get in a few extra winks of sleep think of the little children who are being put through the discipline of being at school at 5:00 A.M."

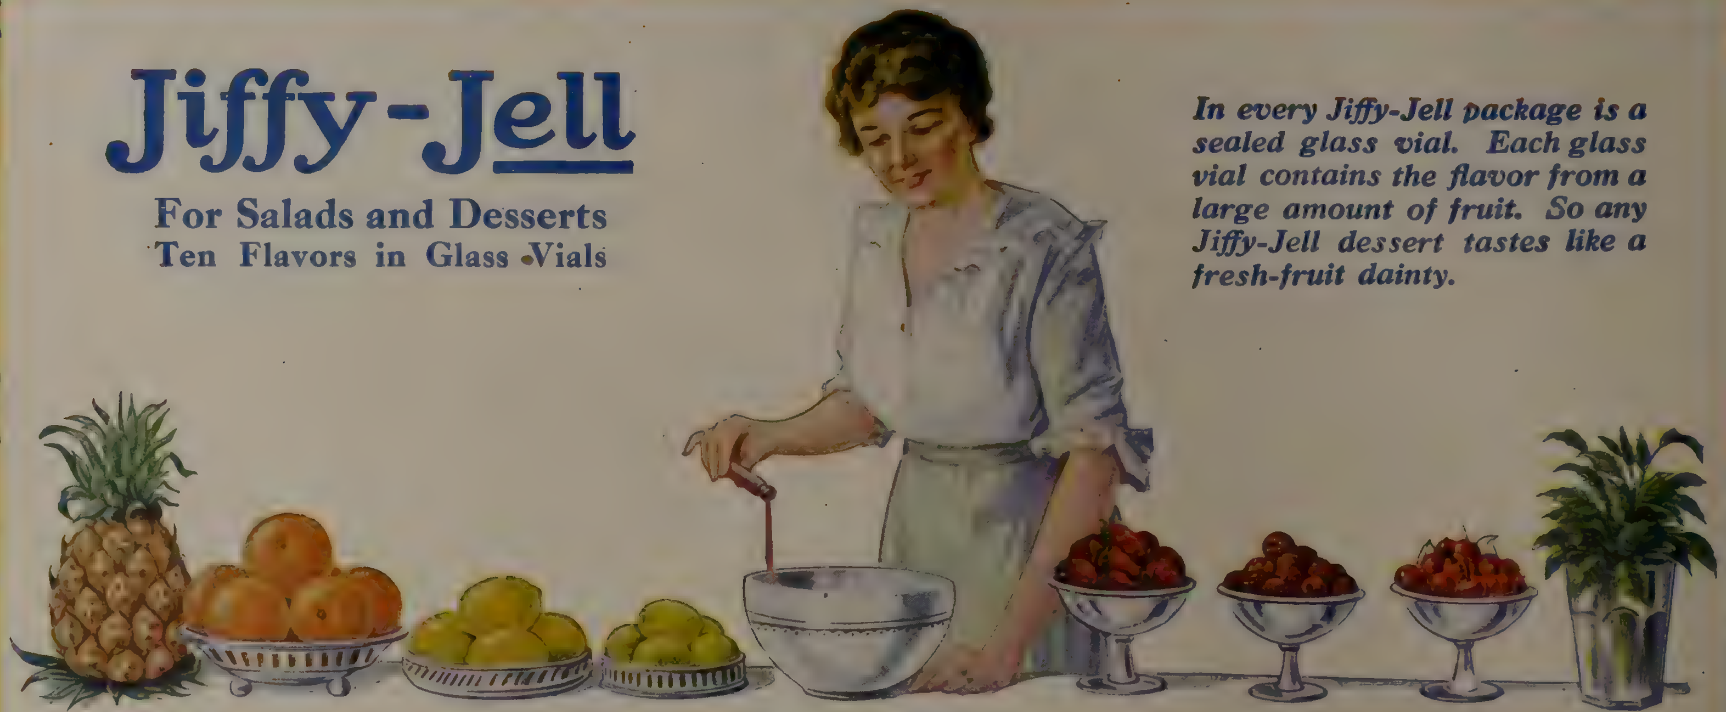
Jiffy-Jell

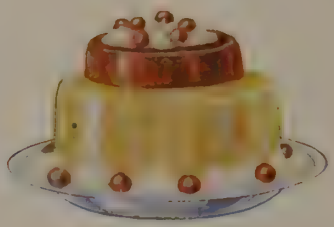
For Salads and Desserts
Ten Flavors in Glass Vials

In every Jiffy-Jell package is a sealed glass vial. Each glass vial contains the flavor from a large amount of fruit. So any Jiffy-Jell dessert tastes like a fresh-fruit dainty.



Just Like Having All These Fresh Ripe Fruits Before You

The Fruit Flavors in Glass Vials Mean Everything



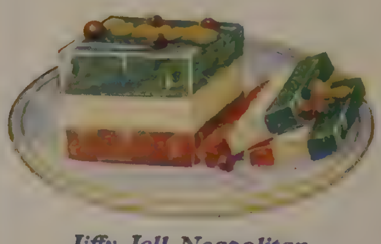
Pineapple Jiffy-Jell
With Garnish or Without

Jiffy-Jell is a new style quick gelatine dessert. One great distinction is true-fruit flavors—made direct from fruit. And each flavor sealed in a glass vial.

The flavors are highly concentrated. Half a ripe pineapple, for instance, is used in the flavor for one dessert.

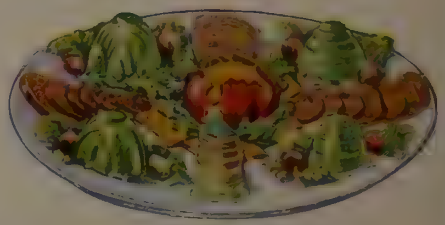
Sealed in glass vials, the fruit flavors cannot change. You add them when the jell has partly cooled, so boiling water poured on the mixture does not scald the flavor. Thus Jiffy-Jell desserts taste like fresh-fruit dainties.

All the delights in jelly desserts depend on the fruity flavor. Here is a wealth of real-fruit flavor. And it comes to you with all the fruit-time freshness. You will find Jiffy-Jell ten times as good as some of the old-time jells.



Jiffy-Jell Neapolitan
Cherry, Lemon and Lime
Made in Layers

A rare-grade gelatine—Waukesha gelatine—is used in Jiffy-Jell. The owners of Jiffy-Jell control this extra grade, which costs twice as much as the common.



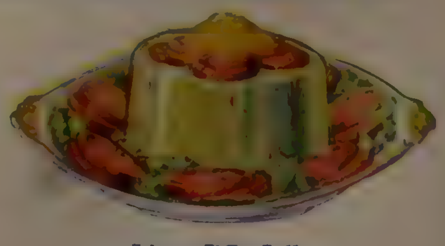
Mint Jiffy-Jell
On Lamb or Cold Meats

Mr. Otis E. Glidden, the great gelatine expert, is the creator of Jiffy-Jell. And he superintends the making.

Amid Waukesha springs, the model food plant of America has been built for making these Jiffy-Jell desserts.

A hundred desserts are at your command with Jiffy-Jell on hand. The plain kinds are made in a moment. Simply add boiling water. Or add fruit, chocolate or nuts, and top with whipped cream, if you wish. Ask for our book of recipes. They are economical, refreshing, fruity, easy to digest.

For a Salad Jell use lime-fruit flavor. It makes in an instant a tart, zestful, green jell. Serve it with your salads, or mix the salad articles into it and let them jell together.

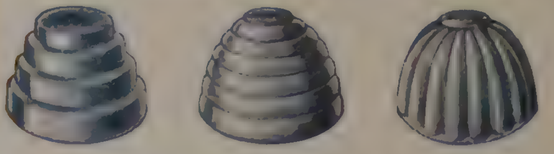


Lime Jiffy-Jell
In a Salad—Tart and Zestful

With Mint Jiffy-Jell you can quickly make a mint sauce or a mint jell. And the flavor comes from fresh mint leaves.

Please try it. Jiffy-Jell is fast superseding all the less-inviting dainties. It is bringing to millions a new conception of jelly salads and desserts. The first package will win you. Order it now, in the flavor you desire. Or, if you wish to try it first, write us. We will mail a package free, rather than have you miss it.

Waukesha Pure Food Co., Waukesha, Wis.



Jiffy-Jell Molds

Six for 10c—Value 60c

Buy from your grocer six packages of Jiffy-Jell, assorted flavors. Write us that you have done so, naming the grocer. Enclose ten cents for postage and packing. We will then mail you six dessert molds, made of pure aluminum, in assorted styles. The usual price is 60 cents. This offer ends Nov. 10.

"When did you write mother last?" cries the poster in this Y. M. C. A. "hut" in France

The Red Triangle at the Front

By LEWIS EDWIN THEISS

A CORRESPONDENT was stumbling through a slippery communication trench near the firing-line in France when a shell struck near by with a terrific explosion. As the correspondent rounded a bend in the trench he saw uniformed men crawling from under the mass of débris, brushing dirt and mud from their bodies and faces.

"A narrow escape for those officers!" said the correspondent to his guide.

"They're not officers," returned the guide. "They're Y. M. C. A. men. Those boys have no fear. They are everywhere, giving help."

That is where you will find the Red Triangle and the men behind it in this war—everywhere, giving help. Some one has said that the Y. M. C. A. followed Pershing into Mexico and met him in France. The Red Triangle is at every training-camp and cantonment in the United States. It is at army posts all over England. France is dotted with it. In Turkey, in Egypt, in Russia, in the Balkans—wherever men are fighting for freedom and the safety of democracy, there the Red Triangle is to be found.

Monotony is perhaps the worst foe of the soldier; and the men of the Red Triangle are the foes of monotony. The Y. M. C. A. alone brings the home touch to a military camp. There are no shops, or clubs, or churches, or homes, as a rule, in military camps. There is nothing but tents—rows upon rows of them, or line upon line of wooden barracks—and drills, day after day and week after week and month after month. The Y. M. C. A. furnishes the home touch, brings change and entertainment to vary the monotony, and keeps the men whole-hearted and happy in their work.

NOBODY knows better than the men of the Red Triangle that idle hands offer Satan his best opportunity. So the men in the "Y-huts," as the Association centers are called, endeavor to fill up the idle moments of the soldier with harmless amusement or helpful work. In the Y-huts are books and papers and magazines for those who want to read. Chess, checkers, dominoes, and a hundred other games are at hand. Baseball outfits or footballs are to be had for the asking. A great, long table with pens, ink, and stationery are free for those who want to write letters; and the query, "When did you write your last letter home?" has kept more than one boy in khaki in touch with his family. A teacher will furnish instruction in French for those who wish to study the language. Little cakes, candy, chocolate, chewing-gum, soft drinks, and other harmless sweets that vary the monotony of camp food are to be had at trifling cost. Motion pictures furnish amusement at night and keep the men away from questionable places of entertainment. And a piano is always at hand for the tunes American boys delight in. Truly the Y. M. C. A. secretary in the military camp is the living example of Paul's dictum of "all things to all men."

WHEN our boys first stepped on the wharf in France, this sign stared them in the face: "Y. M. C. A. Come in!" The boys did come in, too. And there, after a monotonous voyage, they found Scott and Dupre, two hustling American Y-men, who had all kinds of American newspapers and magazines, and even chewing-gum and peanuts! Here they changed dollars into francs, secured booklets on French, bought post-cards, and wrote home.

In Paris the Y-hut is an old mansion at 31 Avenue Montaigne, which once was owned by Napoleon III. When groups of men come to Paris from the various camps, they are met at the station by Y-men and directed to suitable hotels and boarding-houses. They are invited to the Association and sightseeing parties are arranged for them.

In France there are 429 Red Triangle branches, and each branch has several districts to look after. Altogether there are more than 1,600 Y-stations within the actual war zone. Mesopotamia has 47 centers and India 45. Along the Mediterranean there are 35 stations. Fifty-eight centers minister to the soldiers in Egypt. The British Isles have 1,000 centers. And there is a Y-station at every important naval base here and abroad. Even the prison camps have their Y-workers.

"SOMEWHERE in France" there was a Y-station in a communicating trench near the field kitchens. The Germans had the range and the station suffered with the kitchens. The first thing the Y-man did, after his hut was demolished, was to rescue his Red Triangle from the débris, wipe it off, and nail it up again. Then he went unconcernedly about his business. No wonder the men in the trenches cheered him!

From "Billy" Boyd, a Y-man on the eastern front, came the letters from which these extracts are taken: "I am writing this note in my little dugout, which has been my home for several days and probably will be for many more. The dugout is six by three and three feet high. When I stretch out full length my head and toes touch each end of my abode. I can't stand up in it, as you may guess, so must always assume a sitting posture. At last I am in the thick of things, and it seems good, for I feel more as though I am doing my bit when exposed to the same conditions as the men."

WHEN fighting began at the Dardanelles, conditions were particularly trying for the soldiers. There was no protection from the shells that raked the British positions day and night. The rations were monotonously unvarying. The strain on the men's nerves was terrible. An appeal was sent for a Y-man. Within less than a week, an outfit was on the way, consisting of a piano, plentiful supplies of stationery, reading and writing materials, games, and surgical supplies. A hut was made of sand-bags and sheet iron and the Red Triangle hoisted. The Turks respected the sign, and the Y-hut went untouched.

Of all the battle fronts, that in Mesopotamia presents perhaps the greatest hardships. Fevers and heat strike down almost as many men as the enemy does. Thousands of soldiers crowd the army hospitals. Yet here are Y-men facing every danger.

Do not think that in doing all these services for the minds and bodies of the soldiers the Y-men have lost sight of their spiritual welfare. They have not. But they have learned by experience that they defeat their own ends when they obtrude religion on the soldier. Following their divine Exemplar, they go about doing good; and wherever there is a proper opening, they sow the seeds of faith. There are Testaments at every Y-hut, but they are given only upon request. The Y-men will pray with—not for—the soldiers at the slightest opening. They will talk with and counsel them about their souls' welfare, when they see that such counsel is welcome.

"A hungry man is a bad man to whom to suggest prayer," said a Y-man from the trenches. "It is a waste of breath to tell a foolish soldier, who has drunk too much, that he ought to go to church. Help him, and see that he has a chance. Then he will listen."

Figures cannot measure the spiritual benefit that follows the ministrations of the Y-men. But figures will give one an idea of the material services rendered. In one consignment of Y. M. C. A. material recently sent to France were included 200,000 sheets of stationery, 100,000 envelopes, 10,000 pounds of sugar, 5 tons of chocolate, 600 dozen packages of biscuits, 20,000 packages of chewing-gum, 500 folding chairs, 10 folding organs, 100 moving-picture machines, 100 talking machines, 5,000 records, 500,000 phonograph needles, 4,000 quarts of ink, 500,000 pens, 100,000 penholders, 100,000 pencils, 500 baseball gloves, 400 bats, 5,000 base-balls, 300 basket-balls, 7,000 sets of checkers, 20,000 Testaments, 10,000 hymn-books, 2,000 blankets, 500 camp cots, and 100 typewriters.

SECRETARIES by the hundred are being rushed to the front. The French are calling for more Y-stations. The Russians want more. Italy wants Y-men. Everywhere there is a demand for more stations. In the United States 1,800 trained men will be stationed at the camps by January of 1918. For France and Russia, 800 additional men are wanted. The Association has depleted its ranks of trained workers. Now it is fitting men, through short courses, but it cannot keep up with the demand. To carry on its work it was estimated that an initial $4,000,000 was needed. Five millions were raised. Now the war work council of the Y. M. C. A. is asking for $35,000,000—and the people will give it. For, says an observant writer, "The Y-huts are regarded as power stations, helping to maintain the spirit of the army."

What the Bible Teaches About Russia

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

[This article is the first of the New Series of contributions on Prophecy, written by Dr. Gray to follow and supplement the previous Series entitled "The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy." The next article in the second series will deal with "Babylon; Her Coming Restoration and Her Fall." The third of the Series will deal with the Millennium.]

I

BECAUSE of some things to follow in this article, the writer deems it prudent to begin with a declaration of political faith.

He is no pacifist, but a firm supporter of the government's position in the present war. He also rejoices with Russia in her new-found freedom, and hopes for the day when all classes of her democracy will be thoroughly united in an invincible prosecution of the war. So far as he can see, such a solution of her present difficulties is essential both to her own welfare and to anything like an early ending of his terrible world-wide conflict.

But after saying this with absolute sincerity and in good faith, he is obliged to add, as a faithful interpreter of the Word of God, that he would not be surprised if the democracy of Russia were short-lived. Not necessarily that this decade or even this generation should witness its demise, but only that, sooner or later, she will return to some form of monarchical rule. The Bible seems to foreshadow this. And, indeed, that Russia should at length be found in alliance with Germany, or Germany with her, is not one of the improbabilities, judging from the same source.

II

TO set this before the reader requires a brief recapitulation of some of the things spoken of in the previous series of articles on "The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy."

For example: our Lord Jesus Christ is to return again from heaven, prior to the introduction of the Millennium upon the earth, of which Millennium it is purposed to speak more at length in an article to follow. This return, as previously stated, is an event of two stages. There is a coming for his saints, when the dead shall be raised and the living caught up to meet him in the air (I Thess. 4); and a coming with his saints and his holy angels in judgment upon the living nations and to set up his kingdom on the earth, or in other words, to begin his millennial reign. (See Zech. 14; II Thess. 2, and Rev. 20.)

Between these two stages there is an interval, the length of which is not revealed, but which is identified by some with Daniel's "seventieth week" so-called, or a period of seven years at the close of the present age, which that prophet predicted (chapter 9). However this may be, momentous events will be occurring on the earth during that interval, and not a few of them in Palestine and the vicinity of Jerusalem.

In the first place, the Jews will have regathered there in large numbers, and be under the protectorate of some Gentile power.

In the second place, the nations of Europe, formerly constituting the Roman Empire, will have become federated again under a single head, according to Dan. 2 and Rev. 17. There are reasons for believing that one object of this federation is the control of the near East, as it has come to be called, and which includes necessarily Palestine and Jerusalem, which Ezekiel calls "the middle of the earth" (38 : 12, R. V.).

At this point it is that Russia's destiny comes into view, which nation, with her Eastern allies, will also come up against Palestine. Whether this step on her part is at the same time that the Western nations gather there, and for the purpose of opposing them, or whether it is later and after the Roman Empire with the Antichrist at its head shall have been destroyed, is not determinable, perhaps; but there is no debate among students of prophecy as to the main fact.

III

AT the beginning of the 38th Chapter of Ezekiel, the prophet is told to set his face "toward Gog of the land of Magog, the chief prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal, and prophesy against him." There is no dispute among philologists and archeologists that "Gog" and "Magog" here stand for a powerful Scythian dynasty of Ezekiel's time. Besides this, we have in "Gog" the first syllable of the word "Caucasus," the name of the mountain range crossing the peninsula of Russia, which divides the Caspian from the Black Sea.

In "Rosh" also we have the first syllable of "Russia," while "Meshech" and "Tubal" are the original forms of "Moscow" and "Tobolsk," which were immemorially in possession of that nation. A reliable ancient map placed by the side of a reliable modern one will identify the territories.

But it is a prophecy of divine anger against her and the nations which are allied with her. These are named as "Persia, Ethiopia and Libya . . . ; Gomer and all his hordes; the house of Togarmah in the uttermost parts of the north, and all his hordes. . . . Be thou prepared, yea, prepare thyself, thou and all thy companies that are assembled unto thee, and be thou a guard unto them."

"Persia" we identify; "Ethiopia" is thought to mean the present Abyssinia; "Libya" a part of Egypt; "Gomer" has for its latest analogue "Crimea," and "Togarmah" some would identify with Armenia and others with "Turkestan."

Germany is not mentioned in this list, indeed, except as she may be included in the name of some of the countries whose boundaries are not clearly defined. But what the Bible omits in this case the Russian annals to which we refer later may be said to include.

IV

BUT what of the time when this shall be fulfilled? As verses 1–7 indicate the nation, so verses 8–12 indicate the time.

It will be "after many days" and "in the latter years," a Hebrew idiom pointing to the close of the present dispensation. But whether or no this is the case, it must be a period still future, for the reason that the military combination referred to in verses 5–7 has not yet appeared in history. Russia with Persia, Egypt and the other nations in her train represents a mobilization of armies which the world has yet to witness.

But, furthermore, it will be the time when Israel shall be gathered again in her own land, and when she shall be dwelling in comparative quietness and safety (see verses 8, 11, 12).

And now what of the results? What shall be the consequence of this invasion of Palestine on the part of Russia? Read verses 18 to 23 of chapter 38, and 1 to 24 of chapter 39.

God's fury shall come up into his nostrils, and he will not only slay them with the sword but with pestilence, and the forces of nature, such as rain and hailstones, and fire and brimstone, like unto Sodom and Gomorrah.

Two items give a very vivid picture of the terribleness of this slaughter. One is that Israel will be seven months burying the dead, and the other that the wooden portions of their accoutrements of war will furnish fire kindlings for seven years.

Prior to the present war, statements of this character would have been considered luridly extravagant; but in the past three years we have become so accustomed to gigantic devastation that they fail to surprise us.

V

THERE are certain inferences to be gathered from the above, both of a political and religious nature. The people of God have often been able to read history generations and centuries in advance, and it seems probable that they may do so here. Of course, dogmatic assertions are out of place, but if our interpretation of Ezekiel be correct, then the present alliance of Russia with the Western nations is not likely to be permanent, for they are of the original Roman Empire, to which she never belonged. And for this reason it is more likely that one of these days the relationship of Russia and Germany shall become close, for Germany, like Russia, was never of the Roman Empire, except as to that part of her territory west of the Rhine.

In this connection the reader will be interested in a few paragraphs from the last will and testament of Peter the Great, the noted monarch of Russia, and which has always been regarded as one of the most famous documents of modern history. We quote them from the London Times:

> (1) "The Russian nation must be constantly on a war footing, to keep the soldiers warlike and in good condition. . . . By these means peace is made subservient to war and war to peace in the interest of the aggrandizement and increasing prosperity of Russia.
> (3) "No opportunity must be lost of taking part in the affairs and disputes of Europe, especially in those of Germany, which from its vicinity is one of the most direct interest to us. . . .
> (8) "We must keep steadily extending our frontiers—northward along the Baltic, and southward along the shores of the Black Sea.
> (10) "Moreover, we must take pains to establish and maintain an intimate union with Austria, apparently countenancing her schemes for future aggrandizement in Germany, and all the while secretly rousing the jealousy of the minor states against her. By this way we must bring it to pass that one or the other party shall seek aid from Russia, and thus we shall exercise a sort of protectorate over the country, which will pave the way for future supremacy.
> (12) "We must collect around our house, as round a center, all the detached sections of Greeks which are scattered abroad in Hungary, Turkey, and South Poland. We must make them look to us for support, and then, by establishing beforehand a sort of ecclesiastical supremacy, we shall pave the way for universal sovereignty."

That Russia under the Czars has carried out this policy pretty successfully, all students of history are able to testify; and though it is now experiencing a check, yet there is small guarantee that it will never become operative again.

In other words, we are not to expect a permanent peace as the result of the present embroilment of the nations. The president of Chicago University said some time ago that certain of the nations entertain piratical policies and intentions, and are willing deliberately to apply them to the weaker peoples. He spoke truly of the past and the present, and there are reasons to feel that he also prophesied of the future; for nations are but aggregations of men, and men are unchangeable in their nature, except by the power of God, through the operation of faith in Christ Jesus.

But is there no hope? Yes, thank God, but it is found in him and in him only.

When the prophet asked, "Watchman, what of the night?" the watchman said, "The morning cometh, and also the night." The night first, but the morning afterward.

To the true believer, the morning comes when Jesus comes to gather his own unto himself. But although these shall be caught up to meet him in the air, yet there is promise for the earth also. The judgments to follow will be purifying judgments, until at length the nations of the earth shall learn righteousness, and "the kingdom of the world is become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever" (Rev. 11 : 15).

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

OVER THE MARK. It was announced on October 25, two days before the time limit, that advices from all parts of the country indicated the second Liberty Loan had been subscribed somewhat beyond the $3,000,000,000 offered for sale, $3,500,000,000 was estimated as the total, and extra efforts were made by committees throughout the country and it was announced on, October 29 that the maximum of $5,000,000,000 desired by the Treasury had probalby been exceeded. While the bonds were offered to the country as the best means of proving to the soldier that the citizen was with him in the fight, the soldiers themselves, given an opportunity, subscribed surprisingly, the total subscribed in all the forces at home and abroad being nearly eighty million dollars. October 24 and 25 were recognized throughout the country as "Liberty Days," parades, mass meetings and house-to-house canvassing evidenced the patriotism and purpose of the nation.

PLANNING REBELLION. The United States Secret Service was reported on October 24 to have laid bare a conspiracy between Irish revolutionists in this country and a representative of the German government, in which was planned another Easter uprising in 1918 on the anniversary of the Sinn Fein rebellion of Easter Monday, 1916. The German agent and two of the Irish leaders were placed under arrest, one being taken off a ship at Halifax, he having signed on the ship under an assumed name and being provided with a fraudulent passport. Premier Lloyd George, discussing the Irish question in the Commons on October 23, declared that the government had been aware of the plotting in the United States and of attempts to land arms and ammunition in Ireland. He declared that organization for rebellion was a thing no government would permit. He promised to submit to Parliament a bill embodying any agreement reached by the Irish Convention, but he indicated that England would never consent to grant Ireland any independence greater than that freedom within the Empire implied in "Home Rule." Meanwhile, the west of Ireland is reported in a ferment closely approaching rebellion.

PRESIDENT URGES SUFFRAGE. President Wilson, addressing a delegation of New York women suffrage workers at the White House on October 25, asserted that this war was forcing fundamental questions to the front, and that the question of woman suffrage was one which he regarded as fundamental. He reasserted his conviction that suffrage was a matter for the states to settle, but he urged the voters of New York, through the women, to "realize the great occasion which faces them on election day and respond to it in noble fashion." He declared the work of women in organizing the nation for defense had given the final proof of the justice of their cause.

The Supreme Court of Indiana, on October 26, declared unconstitutional the act of the Indiana legislature by which the women of the state were granted the ballot.

TO SEIZE ENEMY PROPERTY. It was announced on October 22 and 23 that enemy property in the United States not pertaining to aliens resident within the country, would be seized by A. Mitchell Palmer, custodian of enemy property, the proceeds of the income from or the sale of this property to be invested in United States government bonds. It was expected that Mr. Palmer would be able to take about $200,000,000 of the second Liberty Loan, and that commodities and credits owned by or due to German subjects would provide perhaps $800,000,000 for the next Liberty Loan. All persons in possession of enemy property, or owing money to enemy nonresident subjects, are required by law to report the facts to the custodian, who will hold the property subject to authority of Congress.

ON THE WINGS OF THE WIND. Italian aviators, in this country to help prepare aviators for America's great air fleet, made a new air record on October 22 and then set it a point ahead on October 23. An Italian Pomilio scout biplane made the 330 miles from Norfolk, Va., to Mineola, L. I., in two hours and fifty-five minutes. It was followed by a big Caproni biplane carrying eight passengers, which made the trip in four hours and thirty-five minutes, establishing a new American record for long distance flight with such a load. On the following day, October 23, a Sia scouting machine, built at the Fiat factory in Turin, flew from Langley Field to Mineola, 350 miles, in three hours and ten minutes, breaking the record of the Pomilio plane of the day before and attaining a speed of 150 miles an hour.

One of the German Zeppelins which was brought down in France had, during its flight, according to delicate registering instruments which it carried, reached an altitude of 42,000 feet, the highest ever reached in aeronautics.

SWEETENING THE EAST. Faced by a serious shortage of sugar in New England, New York and adjoining states, the Food Administration took heroic measures both to provide supply and to prevent extortion. On October 24 an arrangement was closed with Louisiana producers of raw sugar for the shipment of 200,000,000 pounds of raw sugar to the refineries on the North Atlantic coast. In the meantime retailers were encouraged to limit the amount of sugar to be sold at one time to an individual purchaser, and to prevent undue prices by these same retailers the wholesale cost of the sugar to them was published, and with it a statement as to the price they might fairly charge. It was also intimated that retailers who took advantage of the situation to charge exorbitant prices would be refused a new supply by the wholesalers and refiners.

COAL FOR TWO STATES. Dr. Garfield, fuel administrator, on October 24 announced that the United States government would requisition on October 29 the entire output of coal in the Ohio, Western Pennsylvania and Michigan districts, and that this coal would be distributed for domestic consumption in sections of Ohio and Michigan where a severe shortage had been reported, dealers being required to deliver one ton consignments to families which had no coal, large deliveries not being permitted. All available coal cars were to be mobilized to carry coal to these two States.

CONSERVATION IN THE CHURCHES. The religious people of the United States, including Protestants, Jews and Catholics, following a suggestion by Mr. Hoover, are being organized by their denominational leaders into food conservation armies. A number of volunteers, representing all the more important denominations, are stationed in the offices of the Food Administration at Washington, whence they will direct the activities of their membership. The plan is to distribute weekly report cards, which will be signed by housewives and handed in at church on Sunday or mailed, giving the number of "wheatless," "meatless" and "wasteless" meals in each week. This drive, which began on October 28, will continue until December 30.

A POSTAL SURPLUS. Postmaster General Burleson on October 25 turned over to the United States treasury $8,000,000, a surplus of $9,836,211.90 developed by the operations of the Post Office during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917. This is the largest surplus ever accumulated by the Post Office.

THE TEST OF SENTIMENT. It was announced on October 22 that the death of Senator Paul Husting of Wisconsin would result in a special election in the state to fill the vacancy. It was expected that this election would become a test of strength between Senator La Follette and those opposing him in the state, and that the war policy of the government would be the central element in the campaign. At this writing no candidates had yet been named on either side.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The government commission, under the chairmanship of Secretary of Labor Wilson, announced on October 23 that it had arranged a basis of settlement for the mines in the Globe-Miami district of Arizona, where a three months' stoppage of production had resulted in a loss of 60,000,000 pounds of copper. The agreement provided for a workers' committee at each mine elected by the men, and for the employment of all those now on strike, except those guilty of seditious utterances or those members of an organization which does not recognize the obligation of contract. A government arbitrator is appointed to decide all questions of fact arising during the period of the war. . . . There are now in the United States forty-six firms with an investment of $200,000,000 manufacturing dyestuffs, which produce 60,000,000 pounds of dyes a year. Some of the munition companies, most notably the Du Ponts, are manufacturing dyestuffs on a large scale and will turn their plants largely into this field when the war is over.

OUR BOYS OVER THE TOP. It was officially announced on October 27 that some time during the preceding week American artillerymen fired their first shot at the enemy from a French "75" field gun, and that some elements of the American army in France had begun their final training in the first line trenches on a quiet sector of the front, where the German trenches were about 700 yards away. The first expedition "Over the Top" penetrated the barbed wire entanglements and craters of no man's land and returned without a scratch. The night was pitch dark and rain was falling. The Americans were accompanied by their French instructors.

LUTHER IN THE CHURCHES. Sunday, October 28, being the Sunday nearest to the quadricentennial date, was widely observed throughout the country in celebration of Luther's nailing of the 95 theses on the church door at Wittenberg. A great mass meeting filled the New York Hippodrome to overflowing, more than 2,000 being turned away. Protestants of all denominations joined in a great celebration of the anniversary of the Reformation at Carnegie Hall in New York on October 31.

PRAYERS FOR SUCCESS. The President's call to prayer, for the success of the armies of the Union in the war, was heeded throughout the nation, and ministers of all denominations on October 28 led their people in prayer that the high purposes of the nation might be sealed with victory.

FOR THE OLD EVANGELISM. The Board of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, meeting at Atlantic City, closed its session on October 28 with a declaration favoring the return of the old style of evangelism, with the pastors in charge of the work and the revival in the church buildings. A country-wide campaign was planned, and a committee of eight bishops, headed by Bishops Homer C. Stuntz and Theodore Henderson, was appointed to prepare the campaign. A substantial fund is to be raised for evangelism and for missionary enterprises of the church at home and abroad.

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE Austro-German attack begun on October 24 against the Italian lines on the Isonzo front, which resulted on Friday in the breaking of the Italian line west of Tolmino, developed by Sunday, October 28, into a complete defeat for the Italian second and third armies which were retreating all along the front, the retreat in many sectors resembling an utter rout. On October 28 German troops had crossed the Isonzo from the northern end of the former line as far south as Gorizia and had captured this city, taken by the Italians August 8, 1916. They had reconquered the Bainsizza plateau and had forced their way through the passes of the Julian Alps, capturing the Italian town of Cividale on the edge of the foothills, nine miles from the important railway junction of Udine. The Teuton armies claimed the capture of 100,000 Italians and 700 guns. Dispatches from Rome charged that certain elements of the defeated armies had failed to fight and had shown cowardice. It was reported that France was arranging to give immediate help to our hard-pressed ally, which for many months has been trying to convince the other allied powers of the necessity of greater support in coal, iron and ship tonnage. Field Marshal von Mackensen is reported as in command of the Austro-German attack on Italy

In the west, the French on Tuesday, October 23, achieved the most considerable success of many months. General Petain, in spite of bad weather, hurled his forces at the German positions on a front extending from Vauxaillon to Paigny and Filain, a distance of about six miles. This attack was completely successful, in spite of the fact that the French were obliged to advance uphill, and that the Germans had taken full advantage of the natural difficulties and obstacles by turning them into field fortifications.

In the center, the French troops forced their way forward to and captured the strongly fortified village of Chavignon, a little over two miles from their starting-point. On the wings, the success of the French was almost equally marked. On the right, the heights to the south of the line between Paigny and Filain, which dominate those villages, were captured; while on the left the French anchored their wing on the hamlets of Allemant and Vaudresson.

The great advantage to the French of their new situation is that the new line runs along the crest of a ridge of hills which fall abruptly on the north to the plain in which the very important strategic city of Laon is located. Thus, from their present line on this ridge, the French are able to observe every movement of their foes in the plain below. The booty taken by the French was very considerable, 120 field guns of various calibers and over 12,000 men falling into their hands.

On the rest of the French front there were the usual trench raids and artillery duels at widely scattered points. Only on the north front of Verdun was there any further infantry fighting of importance. On that front on October 24 the Germans made a rather determined attack on the French positions north of the Chaume Wood in the region of Hill No. 344. This attack was at first successful, and the Germans captured a portion of the French advanced trenches; but a little later they were driven out by a French counter-attack.

ON the British portion of the front the week was devoid of important incidents. On Monday the French and British made a slight advance of a few hundred yards northeast of Ypres. German counter-attacks during the rest of the week recovered part of the territory thus gained in the region south of the Houtholst forest. British, French and Belgian troops continued their attacks in Flanders throughout the week, the French and Belgians on October 28 capturing the entire Mercken peninsula, two miles south of Dixmude, French troops pushing forward also through the Houtholst forest capturing four villages and a number of strongly fortified farms. The British pushed forward a short distance west of Paschendaele. The German official report claimed that this British advance was halted in the crater field before the German positions.

THERE are reports that George Michaelis has resigned the chancellorship of the German Empire. The cabinet crisis in France has been averted by the resignation of M. Ribot as Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Italian cabinet, facing a critical food situation, was unable to maintain itself in the face of military reverses, and resigned on October 26. A vote of confidence in the Chamber of Deputies failed by 314 to 96.

The submarines were more effective during the week ending Sunday, October 21, for some time past, the British Admiralty reporting seventeen vessels over 1,600 tons and eight under that tonnage as having been sunk. On the other hand, the French losses from this cause during the same period are much smaller than usual, only one steamer of under 1,600 tons having been lost.

THE Russian interior situation does not show any marked improvement. A so-called preliminary parliament, composed of delegates from all parts of Russia, has been assembled by Kerensky in support of his government; but all the radical political parties as well as the Soldiers' and Workmen's Councils preserve their hostile attitude toward this Kerensky government

The Germans are now masters of all the islands at the entrance of the Gulf of Riga. They claim to have taken about 20,000 prisoners and 100 guns in the entire operations. They have also occupied the Wesel peninsula on the Esthonian mainland, opposite Moon Island, meeting with little resistance. on October 26 the cables announced that Kronstadt, the chief Russian naval port and main defense of Petrograd, was being evacuated by the civil population.

President Braz of Brazil proclaimed a state of war with Germany on October 26 following an almost unanimous vote of the Brazilian Congress acknowledging and proclaiming a state of war between Brazil and Germany.

Watch the Mails!!

YOKES of Bondage are not being worn as much this year as formerly; at least not as willingly. After 400 years of subjection to the Turk, the Sons of Ishmael have organized the free kingdom of Arabia and fight today beside their free brothers of Russia and the democracies of the world for Liberty. But—wait. Read the whole story in next week's Christian Herald.

"The World after the War," is the courageous topic of the sermon by Rev. Walter E. Burnett of Washington, D. C., in next week's Herald.

Frank Carpenter next week reviews our army of Iron Miners whose work, necessary to peace, is indispensable in war.

If you want to avoid a headache read what Dr. Vail says next week about these disturbers of the peace.

Our next serial, "Howard Chase," by Pastor Chas. M. Sheldon, a spoken drama that lives in the printed page, will begin in December. More about that later.

NOVEMBER DAWN

NOVEMBER dawn—
The white mist creeps
Up from the sea . . . .
And all the world in silence sleeps,
Save only—me.
For, though the mist is like a shroud,
I know that many a sunrise cloud
Is hidden underneath its folds.
The city, like a jewel, holds
A row of towers, silver-pale,
Like dreams of some enchanted vale.
Church spires rise to greet the day;
They seem a million miles away. . . .
The city, in its foggy dress,
Is magic—touched with loneliness.

NOVEMBER dawn—
The white mist creeps
Up from the sea . . . .
And all the world in silence sleeps,
Save only—me.

Women and the News of the Day

THE War Work Council of the Y. W. C. A. has enlarged the field that it has been operating in since the United States became involved in the world war. The Council is hoping and planning to raise $3,000,000 this year to carry on the campaign in this country and in Europe.

On the 4th of October 15,000 women marched down Fifth Avenue in a great Red Cross parade. They were dressed in the nurse's blue and white, with the red cross on their sleeves. Some of them were engaged in Red Cross work in this country; some of them were on the point of sailing for France.

Mr. Hoover has suggested that housewives, on one day every week, serve "wheatless, meatless and very nearly sweetless" meals. The organization back of the New York City restaurants has adopted the plan, and the public seems to enjoy the original and different luncheons and dinners. If one can really help the nation in such a simple and pleasant way, every one should be willing to help.

The fact that hundreds of thousands of women have gone into the industries since the beginning of the war has naturally given impetus to the movement for cooperative homes in the British Isles. The movement has been endorsed by Overseas, the journal of the Overseas Club, of which Lord Northcliffe is president.

"Great rebuilding schemes will come with the end of the war," it says in its August number. "As we build up a better, cleaner society we will build up better, cleaner homes. Every happy home produces happy men and women; but today every housewife in the land is handicapped and runs her home at unnecessary worry and strain. Cooperative homes, at this time, would be a solution."

Many girls and women, all over the country, have formed "Poultry Clubs" and are working with poultry. They are being patriots by engaging in a work that is necessary to the nation's food supply.

Shops all over the land are asking women to cooperate with them in cutting down the amount of goods that are purchased and then returned. It is a real national duty, they claim, to tear away the unnecessary expense and labor involved in the clerical work that returning goods has always caused. They are also asking women customers to carry, if possible, their smaller purchases home with them.

Bringing Light

WHEN the first reports came of the many blinded in the battles across the seas Miss Winifred Holt felt her heart go out to the sufferers. Her work, in this country, had been established, and the call from Europe was very urgent. So she offered her own services, and her assistants, whom she had trained and inspired, offered their services too. Miss Holt went to France, and there, under her direction, have been established other Lighthouses.

Statistics furnished by the French and British authorities to the American-French-Belgian Permanent Blind Relief Work show that there are in England, France and Belgium more than 3,000 soldiers who have been totally blinded in the war and nearly 25,000 blinded in one eye, a large proportion of whom will eventually lose the sight of the other as the result of shock or wounds. In addition there are in France alone nearly 200 who, besides losing both eyes, have also suffered, by explosions and amputation' the loss of both arms or both legs, or a leg and a hand, and in many cases have been rendered stone deaf in the bargain.

This is the field that Miss Holt is bringing light to. By her ministrations to those who have been blinded in battle she has let sunshine into souls that otherwise would have remained dark! Her labor of love among the French and English soldiers and the German prisoners has created a new war work and a worth-while war charity.

She has given of herself unstintingly and endured many hardships. (Try, yourself, to imagine the heartbreaks, the tragedies, the stark horror of the thing!) Recently she was in this country for a brief visit. Every day was filled with duties, and she explained the work again and again as she collected funds to carry it on and extend it.

She has told of many instances in which men, totally blind and mutilated horribly, have been physically and mentally reconstructed until they became useful citizens. Among the many useful occupations taught them are weaving, rugmaking, typewriting, vasemaking, stencil-working, decorating of all kinds, farming, printing and architectural designing.

America Is Proud of Her

IN "Who's Who" Miss Winifred Holt is listed as a sculptor—and she has indeed no mean ability in that art, but it is in connection with her work for the blind that the world knows and loves her. She is the founder and secretary of the New York Association for the Blind. Through her efforts a home at Cornwall-on-the-Hudson and workshops in New York have been established. President Taft, after hearing of the work done for the blind and of the hundreds who had not only been made self-supporting but had been raised from the depths of despair, christened the New York Headquarters "The Lighthouse." The name is so suitable that it has been universally adopted

The Potato Dressed Up

THE potato crop, says Mr. Hoover, has been extremely large this year. Potato-growers in raising such a large crop have been patriots—have stood by their flag. We, if we use potatoes and plenty of them, shall be justifying their patriotism. More than that: we ourselves shall be standing by the flag—our flag! We shall be helping Mr. Hoover's food conservation plan.

Potatoes can be prepared in many ways. Many people know them only when they are fried, boiled or mashed—and so they become monotonous. But the government has issued some potato recipes that are tested and different. I am giving some of them:

SAVORY POTATO LOAF

Three cups hot riced potatoes.
Half cup sausage meat.
Two tablespoons of milk.
One teaspoon of chopped parsley.
Half teaspoon of salt.
Half teaspoon of grated onion.

Mix all the ingredients together. Place in a baking-dish and bake half an hour. Serve in the dish.

POTATO PIE

To one quart of boiled potatoes add enough hot milk to moisten. Season with butter and salt. Mash in kettle in which they were boiled, and beat with fork until light. Stir in half cup of minced ham. Have ready four hard-boiled eggs and half cup of stock or gravy. Arrange potatoes and slice eggs in dish in alternate layers, with potatoes forming top and bottom layers. Brush over the top with milk or egg and brown in hot oven.

POTATO TURNOVERS

Boil and put through the ricer enough potatoes to measure a pint. Add one well-beaten egg, one tablespoon of flour, and season with salt. Turn on a floured board, roll out in circles the size of a saucer. Place on each a large spoonful of dry hash seasoned with onions, and parsley chopped fine. This hash should be dry or bound together with thickening Double over and punch together like a turnover Place on greased baking-sheet and brown in a hot oven. Serve with a thickened sauce made from the gravy in which the meat was cooked, or with tomato sauce.

FAMILY POTATOES

Use six cold or freshly boiled potatoes. Cut into quarters and put in saucepan with a pint of gravy or soup stock. Add one chopped onion, salt, and a little red pepper. Simmer on back of stove half an hour before serving.

POTATO ROLL

Heat one pint of mashed potatoes and half cup of milk in saucepan. Add one tablespoon of chopped parsley, salt, and a little red pepper or paprika. Stir in four well-beaten eggs and mix thoroughly. Remove from fire and beat until light. Heat one teaspoon of fat in frying-pan, and spread the potato mixture evenly over the pan Cook until golden brown. Roll like an omelet and serve smoking hot.

A Conservation Bazaar

MANY church societies hold their annual bazaar just after Thanksgiving when everybody begins to think of Christmas presents. This year the conservation booth should be the big feature, and the most original one, of the affair.

By having such a booth you can see to it that every one has a chance to lay in a stock of Christmas presents of the good things that church members have conserved during the summer. Give the bachelor folk a chance to buy small fancy jars and attractive packages of home-made products. Give the tired housewives who have no chance to do preserving and canning a chance to buy all they need.

Begin planning the bazaar at once so that you can now salvage anything that is left of garden and orchard. Apples and pears are still available for fruit syrups, jellies, and preserves. Grapes can be used for spiced grapes, grape syrup, grape juice, and grape butter.

Many women this summer did an extra amount of preserving. Some of these will be glad to donate their surplus to the bazaar. Some will be glad to sell, through the bazaar, on a commission basis.

By making plans now original ideas can be worked out by the time the bazaar is held. Sales will depend very often on attractive containers and fancy wrappings. Put up unique boxes of dried corn and soup vegetables, rustic baskets of assorted jellies. Unusual products will find a ready sale.

NOVEMBER NIGHT

NOVEMBER night—
The storm winds blow,
The air is touched with hints of snow:
And yet a few stars, winking through,
Are laughing down on me—and you.

THE fire crackles merrily;
The candles cast their yellow glow,
Like tender smiles which seem to know
That winter time can never be
When hearts are young and hearths are bright,
And souls are singing wonder-songs,
And cares and doubts and fears and wrongs
Are shut away from cheer and light!
The paisley shawl upon the chair
Is filled with vagrant colors blent,
The old andirons, strangely bent,
Reflect the gleaming of your hair.
Outside the earth is touched with chill:
Here happiness and love reside,
And you are sitting by my side—
We softly speak, and then are still. .

NOVEMBER night—
The storm winds blow
The air is touched with hints of snow:
And yet a few stars, peering through,
Seem laughing down on me—and you.

THE RICHES OF HIS GRACE

A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—Eph. 1:7, 8. R.V. "The riches of his grace, which he made to abound toward us in all wisdom and prudence."

THIS passage of Scripture images itself to my mind under the varied figure of a spring, out of which there flows a plenteous river, which creates and fertilizes rare and beauteous growths. "The riches of His grace"—that is the inexhaustible spring. "Which he made to abound toward us"—that is the broad and shining river. "In all wisdom and prudence"—these are the lovely creations in personal character.

"The riches of His grace." Who can define the word "grace"? It is far away the greatest word in the New Testament Scriptures. Many minds peer into its unfathomable depths and each discovers new treasure. One commentator looks into grace and describes it as "benevolence." Another returns with the descriptive word, "benefaction." Another prefers the more comprehensive word, "love." And then Dr. Dale declares that grace transcends love: "It is love which, after fulfilling the obligations imposed by law, has an exhaustless wealth of kindness."

PERHAPS we had better mass all these discoveries together in order to shape our conception of the wonderful contents of this wealthy word, and even then our mental grasp will only touch the fringes of its multitudinous treasure. Let us think of some of the biggest things that stand out obtrusive to the common eye, and in the common life, and then by the side of these overwhelming presences let us place the majesty of grace.

I think then of pain. Pain is one of the biggest things I know; I find it everywhere. I have only to speak to my neighbor, and if he will uncover his secrets I shall discover "a thorn in the flesh." But over against this ubiquitous presence of pain I raise the conception of grace: "My grace is sufficient for thee."

I think, too, of temptation. Temptation is one of the biggest things I know. I think of the powerful seductions and the insidious snares which act like mystic gravitations upon the soul, and their power appears to be irresistible. But over against temptation I raise "the riches of His grace." "He giveth more grace," or as the marginal translation gives it, he giveth a "greater" grace. Big as temptation is, grace is greater.

I think, too, of actual sin. This is the biggest thing I know. I look into my own life, I gaze upon the lives of my fellows, and everywhere I find its tyrannous sovereignty. But over against sin I place "the riches of His grace." "Where sin aboundeth grace did much more abound." Grace is bigger than our biggest things!

"Plenteous grace with thee is found.
Grace to cover all my sin.'

We have "grace to help in every time of need." This grace God has made to abound toward us; it flows toward our life with the energy of a full and plenteous stream.

AND what are the resultants in character? "He made to abound toward us in all wisdom and prudence." I am a little surprised at the choice of the words. The very same words have been used in an earlier day, and were used in tones of disparagement. "I thank thee, Father, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent." But our Master is using the words with their popular content; the apostle is using the words in their spiritual significance, as Christianized by the mind of Christ. As used by the world, the "wise" man is the man who is merely curious in the domain of truth. As used by the world, the "prudent" man is the trimmer in the realm of conduct. The "wise" man is the hair-splitter, the mere controversialist, the dabbler in inquiry, not for the love of truth, but for delight in debate. Worldly wisdom is mental cleverness; worldly prudence is practical smartness. But these usages have no relationship to the usages of the same words when they have been baptized with the Spirit.

WHAT is the character of the "wise" man who is the creation of "the riches of His grace"? The grace-made man is characterized by his exquisite sense of God. He has a strong and restful assurance of God's reality and presence. All his spiritual senses are alert, and he discerns the helpful nearness of the Lord of All. He sees God! Where others only see the duty, he discerns a beckoning finger; while others only apprehend an abstraction, he discovers a presence. He hears God! "I heard the voice of the Lord God." All his spiritual senses are sensitive, and he is conscious of the nearness of the Eternal.

But there is an exquisite sense of God which cannot be expressed by any analogy of the physical senses. When a loved one is sitting on the other side of the hearth, one has a restful consciousness of her presence. It is not that one is looking at her, or speaking to her; the soul itself seems quietly to discern her presence, and even though the mind be otherwise engaged, as in the reading of a book, this peaceful consciousness of her nearness is ever present.

So it is with the presence of God. The spiritually sensitive man discerns his nearness, and to live in the consciousness of God's presence is to live in "the fear of the Lord." "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." The spiritually wise man has sense of God, and this is the creation of grace.

BUT he has not only a sense of God; he has a perception of truth. The Scriptures tell us that there are some things which the natural man cannot discern. He may argue about them, he may read whole libraries concerning them, but he will never enter into their possession. Spiritual truth is not reached through merely mental processes; it is discovered through a certain quality of life.

A little while ago, in the valley of Chamounix, my attention was directed to the summit of Mont Blanc, where I was told there was a climbing party just reaching the top. I gazed upon the summit, but with my unaided eyes could see nothing. A man who was standing by had an ordinary opera glass, but this rendered me no service. Another man had a telescope of rare equipment, and by the aid of this I could discern the climbers toiling through the deep snow, and could even see the rope by which they were bound together. In the realm of the soul grace supplies that extra power! Grace multiplies the powers of spiritual sight. But it is not by the addition of an extra lens; it is by the renewal and transformation of the organ. Grace renews the eyes, makes them spiritually sensitive, and we are able to look into and discover something of the mysteries of spiritual truth. We are enabled to see into the depths of the "unsearchable riches of grace."

MENTAL equipment will take us but a little way into the deep places of the Atonement, and into the mysteries of reconciliation, and justification, and sanctification; but grace will furnish the soul with powers by which something of their treasure can be apprehended and known. The man who is illiterate but grace-filled may be a splendid pioneer into the realms of spiritual truth; while a man who is educated but graceless will never cross the frontier. These things are "hid from the worldly wise"; but to the man who is wise by grace, they stand revealed in ever-increasing glory.

BUT the riches of grace not only fill human life with wisdom; they also endow it with the further gift of prudence. What is the distinction between wisdom and prudence? Wisdom describes a certain relationship to God; prudence describes a certain relationship to men. Wisdom is sensitive toward God; prudence is sensitive toward man. Prudence is the wise and fruitful application of what I know to be the salvation of my brethren; wisdom discovers ends, prudence is an instinct for means; and both are creations of grace.

Now, it seems to me that prudence is composed of two things: sympathy and tact. By sympathy we interpret our fellows; by tact we approach them. There is a surgical term which perhaps will help our understanding of the word. Our surgeons speak of "diagnosing" a case, by which they mean that they do not confine their observations to symptoms, but seek to read through symptoms to roots, and to discover the hidden things. And there is such a thing as spiritual diagnosis, by which we read the contents of a soul, not being contented with the external, but pierce into "the hidden things of the heart."

NOW, sympathy is our organ of diagnosis. If we would know the inner contents of a man's being, it must be by the aid of a refined and exquisite spirit. And here we come close to the ministry of grace. For if there is one thing which grace clearly does for a man it is this: it sensitizes his soul and makes him sympathetic. It gives him a disposition which is like a photographer's most sensitive plate, and which receives and records the faintest impressions from the inner lives of others. Grace is a refining ministry, and makes our spirits chaste.

"Let grace our selfishness expel.
Our earthliness refine."

But with sympathy there comes tact. When we know where the wound is, we shall be apt at carrying the balm. When we can discern the hidden fear, we shall know just where to bring the light. We shall be tactful in our mode of approach, in the character of our message, in the tone in which we utter it. These, I think, are the two ingredients of prudence: sympathy and tactfulness; and these are the creations of "the riches of His grace."

The Mission of Every Hour

SUNDAY, November 11. John 12 : 27. "For this cause came I unto this hour." Our Lord used that great defining word in an hour when his soul was troubled. He was meeting the darkness, but not by chance. He met it by appointment. It was the very circumstance which he had to meet and conquer. "For this cause came I unto this hour." What a mighty sense of mission there is in the quiet words! And yet Jesus could have used the same words of every hour in his strangely varied life. The sense of mission ran through all his life like the red thread in an Alpine rope. There was no break in the sacred strand. The mission entered every hour, and he faced every circumstance as the setting of a holy task. "For this cause came I unto this hour":—the hour in the carpenter's shop, the hour at the wedding feast, the hour when he blessed little children, the hour when he offered grace to a fallen woman, the hour when he shared the sorrow of bereaved friends. He encountered every circumstance with the high consciousness that he had come up to it. He was called to stand just there, in that particular hour, and stamp the circumstance with the clear seal of a divinely consecrated life. Every happening was touched and handled in the strength of a sacred mission, and he wrote his Father's name on the face of everything.

And, in our own degree, we too can share our Saviour's sense of mission. We can approach every event with the consciousness of divine appointment. "For this cause came I unto this hour!" To possess this immediate circumstance for the Lord, whether it be bright or dark! That is the meaning of all my previous journey. It is the interpretation of the divine leading. I have been brought up to this hour; now let me seize it for God!

What a sense of authority such a consciousness would give to one's life! We are the divine representatives to deal with each event in the long procession of events which march through all our days. J. H. J.

The Treasures of the Righteous

MONDAY, November 12. Prov. 15 : 6. "In the house of the righteous is much treasure." The Bible has a great deal to say about treasure. More than once Jesus spoke about laying up treasure. When Paul became an apostle of the Christian faith he turned his back upon money, even as he had been wealthy once. Yet Paul has much to say about riches. He speaks of God as rich in glory and wisdom. He speaks of the unsearchable riches of Christ. He alludes to the grace of God in human hearts as a treasure. Perhaps he had in mind the Master's parables in which he likens the kingdom of heaven to a pearl of great price.

Jesus warns us against deceitful riches, and Paul refers to uncertain riches. There are treasures that do not deceive and are not uncertain. They are in the house of the righteous. Yet they are not house-treasures, but heart-treasures. As such they are inalienable. Their values do not fluctuate. Fire can not consume nor floods sweep them from our grasp. They are not taxable. He who has faith in God has something in him which makes him superior to anything that can happen to him. No one of us is poor so long as we possess anything which we hold of immeasurable worth. Let us appraise our faith at its true value. Let us know that the sentiments we cherish, such as loyalty and reverence, love for what is true and beautiful and good, and the hope of immortality—nay, the assurance of immortality—are the fadeless and incalculable treasures of the soul. The treasures of the righteous are not so ephemeral as to vanish away when we look at them. Indeed, we shall hold them all the more securely when we know that they are the things, the only things, the world can neither bestow nor withdraw. The earth is full of the riches of God's glory, and human life may be full of the riches of his grace.

False Redeemers

TUESDAY, November 13. Matt. 24 : 23. "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not." The world is full of frauds. Lies and deceptions abound in all walks of life. The crimes which are thus perpetrated are readily recognized and often punished when they affect our temporal interests. We proceed against the food adulterator, the counterfeiter, the manufacturer of shoddy articles, etc.

But frauds invade also the domain of religion. Satan comes garbed as an angel of light. Men pretend to proclaim God's truth while publishing the vanities of their own minds. Even the most august and adorable figure in all the Scriptures, Christ, is exposed to unholy uses for purposes of deception. False Christs shall rise and pervert the minds of many. They profess reverence for God and the Bible, they adopt the language of the Scriptures, they pretend to teach men the true way of salvation, they impersonate Christ, while they artfully corrupt his teaching by connecting with the terms which he employed an altogether different meaning.

The Christ of the prophets and apostles is the incarnate God, come to save that which is lost. The Biblical Christ is the Mediator between God and men, who by his holy life and innocent death in man's place has effected a reconciliation of God with the world of sinners. The Christ of the Scriptures offers men the fruits of his redeeming labors in the Gospel as a free gift of the mercy of God, and fills those who accept his gracious offer with his Holy Spirit, so that they begin to battle with the sins that beset them within and without, and are eager to attain to that perfect holiness without which no man shall see God.

A Christ who is not essentially God and Man, who has not in any real sense offered himself as the ransom, the price of redemption for sinners, and whose teaching does not lead men to newness of life, to strict conformity with the will of God, is a false Christ. Scripture warns the children of God that toward the end of time the danger of having counterfeit redeemers and deceptive schemes of salvation proposed for their acceptance will be greatly increased. We need to be well grounded in the teachings of Christ and close readers of his Word, as the end approaches, in order that we may not be caught in the nets which designing men have spread for the unwary. Christ himself is the person warning us in our text. W. H. T. D.

The Legacy of Greatness

WEDNESDAY, November 14. Prov. 10 : 7. "The memory of the just is blessed." The glory of ancient nations is perpetuated by their wealth in noble characters. All else may have perished, but great and good men never die. Every progressive movement in history had a hero for a leader. Men of just character have been the pioneers of the race, the architects of institutions that have blessed mankind. The glory of reformers grows brighter though the fallen nations lie buried in oblivion. Nations are not created for immortality. They are for the protection of undying millions journeying through time to the everlastingness of the future.

Nations give liberty to the body, freedom and training to the mind, protection to property and life; while the man is building his individual structure for God's eternal kingdom. Carlyle once said England would sooner give up her Indian empire than her Shakespeare. Is not America's pride and glory in the names of a dozen men who have been the leaders in founding and preserving the Republic,

> The pillars of her people's hope.
> The centre of the world's desire.

Keeping the memory of our heroes vivid helps to make us like them in their untarnished beauty and moral splendor. Do we not live for posterity when we live for present nobility?

After men die, we look upon them from the standpoint of eternal things; the scaffolding is taken down; externals fall away, while the completed edifice shines in the beautiful light of God. It may not be a desire for the highest aim to say,

> What can I do to be forever known
> And make the age become my own?

But it is next to the highest, which is to be well known in the ages to come as the children of the Highest.

Life's Widening Horizons

THURSDAY, November 15. Zech. 4 : 1, 2. "And the angel that talked with me came again, and waked me, as a man that is wakened out of his sleep. And he said unto me, What seest thou?" The geographical world known to people in Bible times was relatively small. If we come down to the Christian era, and fifteen hundred years into the Christian era, we shall find the horizon not greatly widened. Then came Columbus, and the thoughts of men grew broader. In times much nearer ours, daring spirits have enlarged the boundary of our knowledge of the world until it is scarcely possible that any considerable land on the face of the globe is hidden from our knowledge. Political horizons have been equally slow to enlarge. The end of the World War may not yet be in sight, but one thing is in sight, and that is the certainty that when peace shall come the common people shall be much nearer the throne than they have ever been before. Political boundaries are fixed in the realm of thought. No tyrant can bind the manhood and womanhood of a race that thinks freely.

We are more, however, than mere bodies and minds. We are more than citizens. We must have other boundaries besides geographical and political. We are dust plus Something. There are spiritual horizons. This is the chief difference between small souls and great. This, essentially, is the difference between the unrighteous and the righteous man. "Our citizenship is in heaven." This word "citizenship" is a very broad one, including friendship, labor, hope, sympathy, conversation, possessions, feeling and thought. Our friendships project into the world to come. Those who are dear to us, whose company we crave but cannot have because everybody is so busy, are the friends with whom we expect to roam the radiant meadows and ascend the delectable mountains of eternity. The primary effect of the entrance of the Spirit of God into human life is to lift up the eyes. The world is fairer to a soul who has found Christ and found in him the secret of life's immeasurable meaning. C. C. A.

Pharisaism

FRIDAY, November 16. Matt. 23 : 23. "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anis and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone." His life-long battle with Pharisaism is the tragedy in the earthly career of our Lord. The Pharisees boasted the ancient law of Moses and the traditions of the elders of their church against the evangelical teaching of Christ. On numerous occasions Christ had showed them that their boast was empty and vain: instead of meeting the holy demands of the law they had emptied the law of its true meaning by their misinterpretation of its commands. For instance, the ordinances concerning tithes applied to the fruits of the field and of the trees; the Jewish theologians had made them to apply to the smallest produce of the garden. Scrupulous zeal in the fulfilment of the law seemed to have inspired this interpretation.

But they had neglected those things in the law which were of the greatest importance and much more difficult to fulfil: judgment, that is, fidelity in the discharge of duties according to the principles of righteousness, conscientiousness; mercy, that is, the sympathetic disposition of the heart toward the suffering; faith, that is, sincerity. It showed how seriously their moral feeling had become blunted, that they were much concerned about little things and cared nothing for the great ones. Their boasted legality went hand in hand with unblushing lawlessness. True and internal adherence to law, our Lord tells these people, places the great matters first, without being lax in the less. Luther applied this arraignment of sanctimonious scrupulosity to the papal laws of his day. The words of the Lord fit every attempt at legalism that has cropped out in the church. W. H. T. D.

The Journey of Life

SATURDAY, November 17. Ps. 23 : 4. "Though I walk through the valley." There are three mountain ranges and three deep valleys on the way from Joppa to Jerusalem. From the first and second mountain summits, the spires of the distant city are dimly visible. On the last height, Jerusalem in its beauty lies before you. Is not this a picture of humanity's journey toward Jerusalem the Golden? Do we not often enjoy glimpses of the coming glory from mounts of transfiguration? Next on the way comes the deep, dark valley of conflict with Apollyon, after which another Delectable Mountain peak, with nearer views of the city of peace and splendor. When through the last valley and shadow of trial and trouble, and after the last climb, the celestial city flashing upon the soul, one sings, "Ah, 'tis heaven at last!"

Changing the figure, life is also called a voyage over the ocean billows to the golden shore. There are mountain waves of mighty peril dashing against your vessel, but they rise to fall into deep chasms of anguish and sorrow. How blessed to know that each wave brings you nearer to your "ain countree"! Each awful breaker wafts you onward according to the Captain's will. He sees and knows all the billows and that there is not a single useless one. We should study how to rise safely on the white-crested waves, as well as how to sink down into its valley of waters, each time making one more bounding leap toward the landing of everlasting life.

> Oh, joy to furl my time-worn sails
> Upon the sea of glass! The gales
> Of heaven are gently wafting me
> "Nearer my God, to thee, nearer to thee!"

Compensations

LOOKING out beyond the welter and struggle of the war, the soul that has faith in God can discover compensations. At the recent annual meeting of the American Board, in Columbus, Ohio, some of these were indicated by well-known missionary speakers. One foreshadowed the dawn of a new day in Turkey, where the terrible sufferings of Armenia had plunged many Moslems into shame and sorrow. The humanizing of the Turk would indeed be a miracle almost beyond belief; yet with God such a thing is possible. Other speakers told of the great evangelistic movements in China, Japan, and India, and the surprising religious transformation going on in Russia, of which the world knows but little. There were glowing reports, too, of splendid progress in other missionary fields, all serving to show that the divine purpose of calling the nations is steadily going forward, and that the war itself is being made a means to this effect. Nations formerly dissimilar in views and ambitions have been drawn closer through suffering and sympathy. They begin to see war as the logical outcome of a wrong attitude toward other nations, and they are finding out that God gives no blessing to the nation that does not consult his will in some very real and earnest way in its national life and purposes.

And right here is a mighty spiritual lever for the missionary's use. It is often urged that Gospel effort should be individualized, yet we see how masses have been moved in India and other lands, and besides, we have Scriptural assurance that the time will come when a nation will be born in a day. What stronger argument could be used than that which relates to national blessings as the reward of obedience, and the reverse for forgetfulness of the divine will and authority?

The blood of the martyrs was the seed of the Church; the blood shed on Calvary has become the glory of Christianity and the salvation of the world. Christianity without the cross is nothing. And if out of the world-struggle and the flame a new hope arises, a better and nobler order of manhood, a finer national life and a clearer appreciation of international obligation, the war will not have been without its compensations.

Appeal to Congressmen

THE new postage rates on periodicals of nation-wide circulation will, if not amended, put many of such publications of the better class out of business.

In the case of the Christian Herald, for example, the postage bill will be increased from about $40,000 a year to about $130,000 a year. Profits, already barely marginal, will be wiped out, and publication can continue only at a large annual deficit. Other periodicals of high quality suffer a like fate.

Can the public afford the death of such publications?

The loss in property to the publishers will be great; but will not the loss to the public, deprived of high-grade reading-matter, be infinitely greater?

Will it not be a painful loss to those accustomed for years to their favorite paper, and will it not be a serious loss of mental and moral helpfulness to the rising generation?

There is a movement in Congress to amend this postage rate. Every reader of a national periodical should be in sympathy with this movement and make his or her influence felt.

Now that the members of Congress are at home, they are easily accessible to their constituents. When in Washington they are overwhelmed with work, but now, at home, they are approachable and their minds are open. Now is the time to see them or write them. Every one can have some influence in the matter. Every word on the subject will have some weight.

We trust that every reader of the Christian Herald will appeal to his or her congressman, at once, at his home, to give this grave matter further and wiser consideration.

The Prohibition Outlook

EVERYTHING points to the resumption, under favorable auspices, of the battle for nation-wide prohibition when the new Congress assembles in December. It is unquestionable that Prohibition sentiment has been steadily gaining, and the expectation is that those who voted for it at the last session will not only stand by loyally, but many who were against it on the former vote, recognizing the trend of public sentiment, will be won to its support next month. Tabulated calculations have been made by the Prohibition leaders with the result that they feel confident of winning new votes for the pending measure when the decisive point is reached. Even discounting all possible changes in membership at the coming session, through death, resignation or removal, the estimates point to a triumphant conclusion of the struggle. Besides, the attitude of the government on the liquor question ever since we entered the war has been a prolific promoter of Prohibition sentiment. Not only in the big home camps, with their multitudes of young soldiers, have the greatest precautions been taken against demoralization through intemperance, but in dealing with the liquor trade, and especially with the saloons, public approval has been aroused in a way that has greatly strengthened the movement. Altogether, the prospects are bright for the success of the coming Prohibition drive. The resolution under which the question of nation-wide Prohibition is submitted to the various states has already passed the Senate, and it is planned to push the campaign to an early vote in the House in December.

The American Pioneers

NOW is the season throughout the land of that quaint custom, the "pioneer settlers' meeting." In many a church, hall and open grove, gray-haired men and women are gathering together and exchanging humble reminiscences which are the real vital history of our country.

Our pioneers, the conquerors of the virgin continent—a mighty host of noble men and women—move, like the tide of empire, steadily westward, never to return. From the East they have passed away. In the Middle West their ranks are being fast depleted by death. On the Pacific Coast and the Great Plains old age is relentlessly stealing upon them. Soon they will be gone, and the crucial, the most strenuous, the most romantic period of our country's development will be embalmed in tradition and buried in the past.

The rising generations, intent upon their own tasks and absorbed in their own ambitions, are prone to overlook the lessons and ignore the examples given us by these veterans of an age when existence was a ceaseless struggle, when hardships unknown today faced them always, when what seem to us necessities were to them rare luxuries, when every settlement, every family almost, was a self-sufficing unit, and life, though hard, was intensely human.

The lives of these man and women have been most extraordinary and most fruitful beyond any others in all history. From the Appalachian Mountains westward to the Pacific they have, within the span of existing lives, turned an unknown wilderness into the mightiest political empire on this continent and the most productive region on the globe.

As the ax-blade is edged with the hardest steel, so the pioneer advance against wild nature and wilder savagery was edged with a class of men that nothing could dent or bend or break. While his horizon was still bounded by the clearing his ax had made, the prophetic pioneer dreamed of continental conquest. His vision saw beyond the dank swamp and the dark forest to the lofty buildings and jostling multitudes of mighty cities; beyond the rank, grass-clad prairies to the seas of golden grain; beyond the harsh life of the log hut and the sod house to the homes of his children and grandchildren, where should be comfort and the higher things of life, though they might not be for him.

The border line the pioneers steadily pushed forward in deploying settlements was one of incessant battles, and just beyond it ever rang the defiant yell of the savage. Along the stubborn march into the primeval mystery the hills blazed with conflagration, the ravines echoed cries of anguish and the streams were dyed by massacres.

Peace has been wrested from the Indian and plenty has been brought from nature; the cry has grown still, the blaze has died down, the streams have run pure from the bloodstains; but the steel is still in the hearts of the surviving pioneers.

Brave men and women, with hope and foresight equal to their hardihood, they have wrought a grand victory in a noble warfare.

The Growth of Habits

A PHILADELPHIA embezzler says he can remember the time in his life when the owing of $3 worried him. But owing money may, like many other things, become a habit and sear the conscience. He acquired the habit and in late years felt no uneasiness in borrowing all the money he could get his hands on, even without waiting for the owner's consent.

"How use doth breed a habit in a man!"

Habit lies at the basis of all our ordinary action. Everything that we do repeatedly becomes easy and habitual.

David Hume declared that the habit of seeing the bright side of things is worth more than a thousand pounds a year.

Diligence, economy and perseverance are habits that carry life as steadily to success as favoring winds carry a ship at sea.

Depravity is not an inheritance, but a character formed by persistent habits. And rectitude is only the confirmed habit of doing what is right.

The truth is not simply that we may form habits; we must form habits.

Could the young but realize how soon they will become mere walking bundles of habits, they would take care to have those habits helpful instead of harmful

The World's War Strength Today

IF the estimates compiled by the War Department in Washington, showing the present military strength of the nations of the world, are even approximately correct, the stupendous total is one which, from whatever standpoint we may view it, makes the strongest argument that can be adduced for disarmament after the war. According to these figures, there are 38,000,000 men now bearing arms, their national distribution being as follows:

Germany	7,000,000	China	547,000
Austria	3,000,000	Rumania	320,000
Turkey	300,000	Serbia	300,000
Bulgaria	300,000	Belgium	300,000
Russia	9,000,000	Greece	300,000
France	6,000,000	Portugal	200,000
Great Britain	5,000,000	Montenegro	40,000
Italy	3,000,000	Siam	36,000
Japan	1,400,000	Cuba	11,000
United States	1,000,000	Liberia	400

Of course, it is not implied that all these are actually engaged in the present war; but they represent in round figures the comparative strength of the two great world divisions at the present time. They are gleaned from reports received by the War Department from reliable sources. This tremendous burden which war imposes upon all the lands is one which, if kept up, would soon impoverish every country on earth. But even the cost of supporting the huge armies and the economic losses caused by their withdrawal from productive occupations represent but a part of the incalculable load imposed by a war like the present. Statisticians would have no difficulty in demonstrating the logical impossibility of supporting such a mountain of expenditures beyond a given period, no matter what the resources of the nations may be. Nearly twenty years ago, Jean de Bloch predicted that war would soon be a luxury altogether too costly for the world. The fulfilment of his forecast has come sooner than expected.

The Young-Old Men

IN several Western cities "young-old" men have formed an organization, that may become nation-wide in its scope, for the purpose of securing employment for men who have passed their prime.

This is decidedly the day of young men, and the man who has passed middle life without having laid up a competency or mastered some special line of work is at a dreadful disadvantage.

But it has always been so. And age, now as always, is not so much a matter of years as of declining enthusiasm.

We have seen men on whose strong shoulders rests the burden of seven, eight and sometimes nine decades, full of unwasted power of spirit and strength which comes from freshness and joy in the work done and the vision fulfilled.

The great work of the world is being done and always has been done by men of middle life and more. Four-fifths of the business failures are made by young men. It is ripened experience and judgment that count in the business world, as in any other.

In physical work the older man may be outclassed by the younger one; but in lines of work calling for skill, steadiness and reliability the older man has the advantage.

There is something seriously wrong with an economic system that finds a man useless at fifty.

Kosciusko's Centennial Celebrated

THE centenary of the death of Thaddeus Kosciusko, one of Poland's most eminent patriots, friend of America and revolutionary hero, was celebrated in a number of places throughout the United States with appropriate ceremonies. The hero was born in Lithuania in 1746. The military talent he early revealed was so pronounced that the Polish government sent him to complete his military education in Germany, Italy and France, and when he returned in 1774, made him captain of artillery. Two years later he volunteered in the American army and was made colonel of engineers and rendered invaluable aid to the cause of the Americans. He planned the encampment of Gates' army on Bemus Heights, which Burgoyne assailed in vain, and was the principal engineer in the erection of West Point, and distinguished himself in the siege of New York and Yorktown. At the close of the war, Congress voted him a pension and lands. He went back to his own country and entered a brilliant fight against the armies of Prussia, Austria and Russia, who were united to crush Poland, but his army was overcome by overwhelming numbers, and his fair land put under the heel of an intolerable despotism. One of the good results hoped for in this world-war is the liberation of Poland from despotism and its reestablishment as an independent nation. Kosciusko by an active life, burning with the love of liberty for his native land and for all peoples, embodied the divine idea thus expressed by the prophet: "To loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke." (Isa. 58 : 6.)

Southern Commercial Congress

THE Southern Commercial Congress held its ninth annual convention in the city of New York beginning October 15 and closing the 17th. It is the first time the Congress was ever held north of Mason and Dixon's line. There were present governors and senators and congressmen from most of the Southern states, and also prominent statesmen from the Northern states. There were thousands of leading merchants, manufacturers, bankers, farmers and business men of every department of industry to depict the varied activities and unlimited possibilities of the South. The Congress was officially greeted by the state and city of New York through Governor Whitman and Mayor Mitchel, and by local residents from the South. Governor Whitman among other things in his greeting said: "The wonderful South, whose men and women have done so much for humanity, is a vast field for American enterprise, and in time of peace, which, God willing, may come soon, we shall turn to you, knowing that humanity cannot call in vain on you for the development of your resources to the full, not only for your own benefit, but for the advantage and benefit of all mankind." Mr. Oscar Straus, chairman of the New York Central Committee, gave a welcome. United States Senator Duncan W. Fletcher of Florida, the president of the body, responded in appropriate words. One of the important features of the Congress was the educational department, whose leaders visited Columbia University and were caught by the camera on the steps of the library. The Congress met at the Hotel Astor, with branch meetings elsewhere. The themes discussed, the characters participating, the information given, the good fellowship promoted and the inspiration derived made the Congress one of the epoch-making events of the nation for the year. It will tend to promote that national unity so beautiful and essential, and that material, mental and moral progress so necessary to a great country like ours. This promise has been fulfilled in the thrift of the great Southland: "Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store." (Deut. 28 : 4, 5).

Fire Destroys 11,000 Cattle

TWO-THIRDS of the area of the Kansas City stock yards, the second largest in the world, was swept by fire on October 16, and 11,000 head of cattle and 3,300 hogs were destroyed. The property loss of buildings and contents amounted to about a million dollars, which was fully covered by insurance. Some of the cattle released rushed out and through the streets of the city. A sample of Western enterprise was given in beginning to remove the débris and in plans for rebuilding the pens the very day of the fire. The policeman who discovered the fire says it was the work of an incendiary, as three fires 2,000 yards apart blazed up simultaneously. Others think it was simply an accident. There is this account of the destruction of food value by an enemy in the burning of the raw grain: "Absalom sent for Joab, to have sent him to the king; but he would not come to him. . . . Therefore he said unto his servants, See, Joab's field is near mine, and he hath barley there; go and set it on fire." (II Sam. 14 : 29, 30.)

Warlike Owls Attack People

CITIZENS of a number of Shenandoah Valley towns have been injured by warlike owls, thought to be mother birds seeking their young, which had either fallen from their nests or were trying to fly too soon. For some years a large number of owls have had their homes in hollow trees in the Episcopal churchyard at Shepherdstown, but this year they moved across the street. Removed from their religious surroundings, and from the solemn decorum becoming to owls under the circumstances, they got on a "tear" and raised a racket with the community. A short time ago a party of women was attacked by one of these birds. It flew at Mrs. E. L. Reinhardt, one of the company, and scratched her face and neck with its beak and claws, and continued its attack till it was driven off with a club by a rescuer. Other persons suffered similar attacks. At Harrisonburg, Va., owls which have nests in tall trees around the residence of J. T. Harris have attacked citizens of that community. Owls are supposed to be solemn and meditative. To be "as solemn as an owl" has become a proverb. Froude in an essay has an owl seriously debating with himself as to which first came into the world, the bird or the egg. These owls in Virginia may have meditated in their solemn mood that as people quarrel, and sometimes have "scraps" even in church, and as the whole world is at war, they can scarcely be blamed if they copy the fashion, and manifest the militant spirit. The owl was unclean to the Jews and not allowable for food; he was counted by them a very solemn bird. The psalmist in his most doleful mood thus likens himself to an owl: "I am a pelican of the wilderness. I am like an owl of the desert." (Ps. 102 : 6.)

England Accepts Statue

ON October 19 Sir Alfred Mond, First Commissioner of Works, announced to the House of Commons that the government of England had accepted the statue of Lincoln. He said no protests against the statue had been received and the government gave hearty welcome to the proposal to erect a statue worthy of the illustrious statesman in the capital of the Empire. Lincoln was large enough, as the statesman, philanthropist and man, to become the property of the world, and England honors herself as well as our nation in accepting the statue. The earthly immortality of Lincoln suggests these words: "Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." (Rev. 14 : 13.)

Bronze Door Brings $1,000

THE auctioneer's hammer came down on the furnishings of an old gambling house in New York said to have cost $250,000, and only $18,000 was realized from the sale. Among other things a gorgeously hand-carved bronze door said to have been wrought in the fifteenth century, a portal with traditions, for which the proprietor claims he paid $28,000, brought only $1,000. The door, which once adorned the wine cellar of the Doges' palace in Venice, swung heavily against the face of virtue in New York. Behind it men risked fortunes and reputations; in front the world, including the guardians of the peace, marched by. But it swings no more in New York between the law and the game. It was sought by a representative of the Prince of Monaco, whose chief income is derived from Monte Carlo, but was bought to adorn a summer home in Southampton, Long Island. What collusion there must have been between the officers of the law and the gamblers, that these magnificent gambling hells should have been allowed to live and thrive in Saratoga, New York, and other cities of the land. A wholesome public sentiment is demanding their extinction. Let the policeman batter in the flimsy doors of the cheap gambling-joint and the bronze doors of the more magnificent palaces of crime, and let the auctioneer's hammer come down on all the furnishings and instruments. The bronze door was more dangerous because a more magnificent gateway to the gambling hell, and many splendid young men went through it into hell, fulfilling this statement of our Master: "For wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction and many there be which go in thereat." (Matt. 7 : 13.)

Russian women, there were over 20,000 of them, crowding into the recruiting office of the Battalion of Death

A Heroine of the Trenches

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

This Letter Was Passed by the Russian Censor. Received Through the American State Department, October 24

Copyright, 1917, by the Christian Herald

SHE is eighteen. Her eyes are a deep blue and her close-cropped hair is red. Her gaze is direct and sincere. Her smile is that of your best boy chum. But when she saw a Socialist cartoon in my room, in which the man who had once been Czar was pictured in an insulting way, her cheeks burned with indignation.

Her left arm is amputated above the elbow. She wears the suit of the Russian soldier, even to the clinking spurs, and on her left breast shine two crosses of St. George and a medal for bravery. After she had gone, and I wondered at the tales of this young girl, my interpreter, who is a judge of character, said decisively: "This girl does not lie." I stake my judgment on the truth of his observation.

Before we had had our long chat over the tea-glasses, but after I had seen that this young woman could tell a wonderful story if she only would, my interpreter emphasized the fact that whatever she did or thought was unselfish and helpful. In the midst of disgraceful retreat, when the fate of a young woman would have been horrible if she had been caught, she remained beside more than one soldier until his wounds had been bandaged or his thirst quenched. Along a hundred miles of front, Irene Ivanovna Potemkyna was known to the simple Russian soldier as "the Angel of the Twenty-third." She ran away to the war during the first mobilization and has lived with men for three years. She describes them as "godlike."

Her equipment consists of sharp eyes, fine hearing and quick decision. She has served as a scout on horseback, on foot and in airplanes. She longs to regain her strength and get back to the front to serve under the flag of the new régime. But to the tip of her cavalry boots she is a loyal soldier of the Czar; for under the old régime the armies of Russia advanced. But there is something more personal than that. She has a horse that she loves, which has been wounded twice, but which has saved her from a pursuing foe on more than one occasion. She can see that fine Russian charger now, with his ears pricked up and almost human intelligence in his eyes, just as they parted within the German lines. And she longs for his soft muzzle at her shoulder and his heaving sides beneath her when there is need to ride for life. She longs for a smell of the leather, even when the stench of death is in the air.

SOME one has said, "Russia is a land of beautiful horses and beautiful women"; and this frank, merry, erect young fellow, mounted on her steed, must have been a sight to inspire a painter or a lover.

She has never known her parents, but when she was very young she was adopted by a kind-hearted general, whose memory she reveres. She loved to play "blind man's buff," to listen to stories of war and heroes, and to play war with the boys. From the first, she has preferred the company of boys and men, though she has never felt deep love for any one. "When they are wounded or in trouble, I love them all," she said.

At nine she learned to read, and was sent to the gymnasium. She eagerly read war stories and cut out the pictures of Czars and generals from the magazines and made a scrap-book that was at variance with her merry cheer. Since then she has known the horror of trench and prison camp, the pain of a festering wound and of the death of a comrade in her arms. At nine she glorified war. At eighteen she hates it. But she longs to get back in the lines.

She was fifteen when the rush of mobilization roused a drunken nation and swept khaki-clad hordes through her native town of Yekaterinoslov, on the Dnieper, crowded into troop trains on their way to Poland. Young as she was, a mere girl, she decided to go to the front. Still dressed in her school dress, she went to the station and boarded a troop train filled with drunken soldiers. They gave her a uniform, and at midnight, hidden under the seat in a train for the front, she left her home to fight for her country and her Czar. She had passed the boundary of Poland, and the train had slid into the once famous market of Lublin, before she was discovered by the authorities, fifteen, a girl, and slight in stature. But she demanded that she be sent to the front. The Twenty-third Division was on its way to the thickest of the battle, and she was accepted. Her heart leaped with joy.

SHE was assigned to duty as a scout, and her work took her across bloody fields in the dark. The sight and sometimes the feel of mangled bodies and the horrors that red war can inflict on the lone scout in the dead of night sickened her, but she felt that she was doing her duty, and gradually the horror became incidental to the day's work.

By day she worked on horseback with the artillery scouts; by night, on foot. Her regiment name was Antone. But day by day her fame spread as "the Angel of the Twenty-third." Her comrades and her commander loved her, but she refused to be babied. She could do a man's work.

On one of the darkest nights of the first winter, she and a companion crept across No Man's Land to the enemy trenches and cut the wire entanglements. Their company went through silently and easily. The two stayed there cutting, cutting, cutting. Past them crept their comrades in arms. There were fifty-four men with their command. Only a surprise attack could succeed.

Finally the barbed wire was cleared away and only the dark masses of the posts stood in the way. As the shooting began, Irene tugged at one post after another, the wire fragments tearing her uniform and wounding her breast. The Germans suddenly awoke to their danger, and the noise of the fighting spread across a long front. She knew that the little band was outnumbered and must retreat. But in the pitch dark she waited until a bursting shell showed her the danger. Standing there alone she repeatedly called to the men and they came back—most of them. "Brothers, here!" was the cry that won for her her first war cross.

DURING the spring of 1915 she was in the Carpathians. The great retreat had passed Cracow. The Minister of War had ordered a general advance, promising plenty of food and ammunition, but after a hard drive at the heart of Galicia the army found itself without supplies and forced to retreat. This caused the young girl to rage at the lack of care for her brothers in battle.

She could hardly walk, her feet were so swollen. But she found relief in helping others. She forgot her own troubles in aiding some fellow whose predicament was even worse. She brought water to the thirsty and dressed old wounds with womanly tenderness. But while she did so, her beloved Twenty-third passed on and she found herself among those whom she did not know. But they had heard of her, and the Thirty-fifth gladly welcomed her to their ranks.

All the time she was in the midst of the fighting. She scouted on foot and horseback at the fourth, fifth, and sixth forts. Then came further retreat. The Russians were compelled to fall back on Lemberg, and had already passed Przemysl, so often captured but never pronounced. They secured Height 213 and regained their courage. The Russian is brave when he knows what he is fighting for, says this girl from the front.

At two in the afternoon of May 23, 1915, Irene was out ahead of her division. She perceived that the Germans were planning an enveloping movement. Strong companies had been sent out by the enemy and the Russians were being surrounded. The enemy began an artillery attack. She worked with the sixth and seventh companies, passing shells to the gunners and carrying water to cool the smoking machine guns. Shells burst around her and she was forced to take shelter in a dug-out. But she feared capture by the enemy. She ran back to the lines and reached the fifteenth company.

The Russians were passing her in a hopeless rabble. She stopped from time to time to aid some wounded comrade. A major passed her and called out to her to save herself. The little red head straightened up from her service of mercy and said, "You should not run. Stand for your country! Or at least help your wounded brothers, lest they fall into cruel hands."

SHE came upon a soldier of the Sixteenth, badly wounded. He told her to leave him to die, and save herself. Her reply was to stretch forth her left hand to help him. A bursting shell killed the wounded man and crushed her left arm. She could only scream as loudly as possible, "Brothers, my hand is gone!"

Another shell lifted her bodily and buried her in the débris. She lost consciousness. It was four o'clock, and she had been scouting ahead of a courageous army two hours before. But in those two hours an age had passed, and she was scrapped and left behind in an insane retreat. During the night, she regained consciousness. She was within the enemy lines. All about her were Russian wounded. The enemy were picking up their own injured but leaving the Russians to die. Her arm pained horribly. She did not want to live longer, and sought some weapon with which to stab herself. But she could not move. She prayed for water, but she had lost her voice and could not call for aid. No one recognized her as a woman. She thanked God for it. A German came and tried to pull her to the enemy camp, then thought it not worth while and pushed her rudely away so that she fell on the stump of her arm. She dragged herself along till she came to a Russian with a crushed foot. Her arm was still bleeding and the bones were protruding from the flesh. The man had no reserve bandage, so he took the dirty bandage from his foot and stuffed it on her wound.

TOGETHER they tried to rise, and struggled on toward the Russian lines. But they did not get far. Germans and Austrians were passing, and they begged for water, but got none. Hard bread was given to them, but they feared poisoning and they threw it away. At last an Austrian ambulance came and Irene was placed on the top of the car. Across the San they came to the temporary hospital of the Austrian Red Cross. A man pulled her off by her wounded arm. One of the doctors, who spoke Russian, recognized the fact that this bit of wreckage from the fields of war was a girl.

About thirty officers of the General Staff, together with the General, surrounded her and tried to cross-examine her to discover what they could about her army. But she only gazed back at them and asked why they used poison gas and killed the wounded rather than aid them. She knew that she was in their power, but said she would be killed before she would reveal anything.

For four months her lot was hard. The prisoners mistreated her and the food was rotten. As her name resembled that of a famous Prince, she was treated worse than ever. She was placed in a cell with a mad woman. This was the most horrible of all.

Then came word that she was to go to a civilian camp. Countess Shovalovoff had known her at the front and had made inquiries for her, but had lost track of her while she was in the criminal prison. Then the glad word came that she could return to Russia or be sent to Switzerland. She crept to the other huts in the night to take leave of her dear friends before departing for her fatherland.

In Sweden the wounded and sick prisoners were received with dinners and music. She received the most attention of all but was so deeply moved that she could say little. When the band began to play, her heart gave a little bound, and immediately this slight woman soldier sprang to her feet as tears filled her eyes. She was almost home, and the band was playing "God Save the Czar!"

She was taken to Petrograd, to the Smolna Institute, where the Duma now meets, while the Taurida Palace, famous as the gala place of the second Catherine, is being renovated for the use of the Constituent Assembly next fall. Another operation was performed on her arm, but Petrograd did not agree with her, and she was sent to Yevpatoria in the Crimea. She was there when the news of the revolution arrived.

They were at dinner when the telegram came saying that the Czar had abdicated. Consternation ensued. These men had fought for the Czar and liked him, though they distrusted the Czarina. The general swooned. Irene burst into tears, for the Czar had been her hero. There was then no thought that the long-expected revolution had succeeded and that the hoped-for republic was a possibility. The only question was, "Who will supplant Nicholas as the next Czar?"

But when word came that a provisional government had been established, that general freedom had been declared, and that there was freedom of speech and the press, all were glad, and the wounded men and this one brave girl, who had fought for the Czar, together with the local authorities, sent a telegram congratulating the provisional government and promising loyalty.

Today this straightforward lovable girl, who seems a mere lad, is resting and regaining her health until she can rush once more into the heat of battle in an attempt to stem the disgraceful retreat. She is brave, modest, sincere, and thoroughly womanly. She answered with remarkable clearness and force the questions I asked her, and her answers are worth repeating, for they represent the feeling of many people older and wiser than this woman who is so young in years, but old in experience.

"What place should woman have in war?" I asked.

The answer was direct, without bombast or boasting. But her eyes flashed as she said,

"Not only men, but women and children, must take active part in war when the fatherland is in danger. In Russia women have equal rights with men. They should feel equal responsibilities. Those who are unfit should do such work as unfit men are doing. Men are braver than women, but the woman who has decided to do something is braver than the man who is compelled to do it."

Knowing men and women as she does, I asked her opinion of the relative morality of the two sexes.

"In morals people differ very much. There are more moral women than moral men. But the men I have fought with have been godlike in their treatment of me. There has been little rudeness, and that was immediately checked by some other man. A decent girl is as safe in the Russian army as she would be anywhere."

"If women go to war, the mothers of the next generation will be killed or weakened in mind or body. Is it then good that women should fight?" I asked.

"Women who can marry now, when their country needs their whole loyalty, are fools. It is not necessary that all women should fight in the trenches. But a woman has as much responsibility to her fatherland as a man has. They should be willing to train themselves for service. Women must realize that rights bring responsibilities."

I thought of the feathered, furred and silk-skirted women who haunt the Nevsky at night as she said this. Surely this upright girl, womanly in the highest sense of the word, was superior to them. But how many of them were fitted for what she seemed to have done so naturally?

She can't understand the reasons for war, but when she learned that Russia's enemies wanted to despoil her, then she thought at once, "How dare they lift their hands against Russia?" She wants to see the war carried on to the very end, which must be crowned with victory. She can't bear the word Germany. When I asked her to compare Russia with Germany, she replied almost hotly,

"How can you compare Germany with our great Holy Russia?"

Her opinion of men and affairs is interesting.

"The generals I admire are Korniloff, Brusillof, Alexieff, Gourko and Grand Duke Nicholas. I admire Kerensky very much too. He is extraordinarily brave and enterprising. But somehow he seems to stand alone in his greatness. Under the old régime, only those in the government were encouraged or taught to think great thoughts or dare great deeds. It will take time for real leaders to be developed from the masses of the people."

THIS determined girl is still gentle. The spilling of Russian blood in Petrograd on the 3d of July sickened her, so that she had to lie down. Yet she proudly carried the most beautiful cross of flowers in the Cossack funeral on July 15, as a delegate of the Georgian Cavaliers. On the day of our last interview things seemed to be going from bad to worse, and I asked her if she would fight under the new flag as gladly as she had under the old.

"More gladly than ever; for though I love the Czar, I love his people more, and they are tasting new freedom, which must be protected from German tyranny. Better to serve an autocrat than a foreign master. And the Czar cannot return. So we must fight harder than ever to give the people a chance to develop a new freedom founded on justice, which our enemies do not understand as well as our most ignorant peasant. But we must have discipline. No prisoner who has ever returned from Germany doubts that. It is better to obey a friend who fights by your side than to have to serve a hated foe."

Irene is a complete character, noble and genuine. To have known her is to thrill with admiration whenever one sees a red-haired lad with honest blue eyes. She laughs at love, for her love is so broad and gentle that it includes even a few Austrians. But in this noble woman there is a flaw that may never heal. There is deep hate in her soul. And war, her pastime, duty and almost her god, has placed it there. What a woman she would have made if there were no war! Or is it fighting for justice and right that has ennobled her, a full-sized heroine at eighteen?

Mrs. Capt. Curry

—how she washes her dishes under difficulties

ON a search for odd places where dishwashing is done, I found the canal boat "Mary and Winnie of Lockport, N. Y." moored alongside a big grain elevator at Weehawken, New Jersey.

Mrs. Curry, the Captain's wife, was talking with a neighbor on the deck. But when I asked to see her cabin, she broke off the conversation to take me down a short, steep stairway. It led into the most compact little home I have ever seen—all in one room.

"You see you've caught me with some dishwashing to do," said Mrs. Curry, pointing to some cups and saucers and plates on the table; "and I'll just finish up if you don't mind—it won't take but a jiffy."

"Go right ahead," I said, and then catching a glimpse of a box of Gold Dust but pretending I hadn't: "What do you use for washing your dishes?"

"Gold Dust," she answered. "And so does my married daughter, and we both keep recommending it to all our friends. What do you use?"

"Gold Dust, too," I replied with a smile.

"Well, I began twelve years ago," said Mrs. Curry. "You see these canal boat cabins get pretty stuffy in summer. We don't like to keep the stove going any more than we can help, and so we don't always have all the hot water we want for dishwashing. Of course, that doesn't matter with the doughy and eggy things, but until I began with Gold Dust, it took an awfully long time to get the greasy ones clean. Now with hot or cold water, you can't get me to use anything else."

In answer to my question she said, with an emphatic nod of her head, "Yes, you can tell anyone you want that I think there is nothing like Gold Dust for washing dishes."

* * * *

DON'T you want to order a package of Gold Dust from your grocer and see how much dishwashing time it saves for you? Gold Dust is economical to use—whether in large or small packages. But for Gold Dust results be sure it is Gold Dust you get. It is for sale everywhere.

CHAPTER XIX

MOTHER MARSHALL got strenuously to her feet from the low hassock on which she had been sitting to sew the carpet, and trotted to the head of the stairs.

"Father!" she called, happily. "Oh, Father! It's all done! I just set the last stitch. You can bring your hammer and tacks. Better bring your rubbers, too. You'll need them when you come to stretch it."

Father hurried up so quickly it was clear he had the hammer and rubbers all ready.

"You'll need a saucer to put the tacks in!" and Mother Marshall hustled away to get it. When she came back the carpet was spread out smoothly and Father stood surveying the effect.

"Say, now, it looks real pretty, don't it?" he said, looking up at the walls and down to the floor.

"It certainly does!" declared Mother Marshall. "And I'm real glad the man made us take this plain pink paper. It didn't look much to me when he first brought it out, I must confess. I had set my heart on stripes with pink roses in it. But when he brought out that roll with the cherry blossoms on it for a stripe around the top, I was just all happy down my spine, it did look so kind of bridey and pretty, like our cherry orchard on a spring evening when the pink is in the sky. And that white molding between 'em is going to be real handy to hang the pictures on. The man gave me some little brass picture-hooks. See, they fit right over the molding. Of course, there isn't but one picture, but she'll maybe have some of her own and like it all the better if the wall isn't all cluttered full. You know the magazine said have 'a few good pictures.' I mean to hang it up right now and see how it looks! There! Doesn't that look pretty against the pink? I wasn't sure about the white frame, it was so plain, but I like it. Those apple blossoms against that blue piece of sky look real natural, don't they? You like it, don't you, Father?"

"Well, I should say I did," said Father, as he scuffed a corner of the carpet into place with his rubbered feet. "Say, this carpet is some thick, Mother, as I guess your fingers will testify, having sewed all those long seams. 'Member how Stevie used to sit on the carpet ahead of your seams when he was a baby, and laugh and clap his hands when you couldn't sew any further because he was in the way?"

"Yes, wasn't he the sweetest baby!" said Mother Marshall, with a bright tear glinting suddenly down her cheek. "Why, Father, sometimes I can't really make it seem true that he's all done with this life and gone ahead of us into the next one. It won't be hard dying for us, because he's there, and we shan't have to think of leaving him behind to go through a lot of trials and things."

"Well, I guess he's pretty happy seeing you chirk up so, Mother. You know what he'd have thought of all this! Why he'd have just rejoiced in it! He hated so to have you left alone all day. Don't you mind how he used to wish he had a sister? Say, Mother, you just stand on that corner there till I get this tack in straight. This edge is so tremenjus thick! I don't know as the tacks are long enough. What was you figuring to do with the book-shelves, put books in, or leave 'em empty for her things?"

"Well, I thought about that, and I made out we'd better put in some books so it wouldn't look so empty. We can take them out again if she has a lot of her own!"

"We could put in some of Stephen's that he set such store by. There's all that set of Scott, and Dickens, and those other fellows that he wanted us to start and read evenings this winter. By the way, Mother, we'd ought to get at that! Perhaps she'll like to read aloud when she comes! That would about suit us."

"Say, Father, that wasn't the telephone ringing, was it? You don't think we might get a telegram yet tonight?"

"Not scarcely!" said Father, with his mouth full of tacks. "You see, it's been bad weather, and like as not your letter got storm-stayed a day or so. You mustn't count on hearing 'fore Monday, I guess."

"These white Madras curtains look like there's been a frost on a cobweb, don't they?" said Mother Marshall, holding up a pair all arranged upon the brass rod ready to hang. "And just see how pretty this pink stuff looks against it. I declare, it reminds me of the sunset light on the snow in the orchard out the kitchen window evenings when I was watching for Steve to come home from school. Say, Father, don't you think those book-shelves look cozy each side of the bay window? And wasn't it clever of Jed Lewis to think of putting hinges to the covers on that window-seat? She can keep lots of things in there! Wait till I get those two pink silk cushions you made me buy. My! Father, but you and I are getting extravagant in our old age! and all for a girl that may never even answer our letter!"

THERE was a kind of sob in the end of Mother Marshall's words that she tried to disguise, but Father caught it and flew to the rescue.

"There now, Mother!" he said, getting laboriously up from the carpet, hammer in hand, and putting his arms tenderly about her. "There now, Mother! Don't you go fretting! You see, like as not she was asleep when the letter got there, and they wouldn't wake her up, or mebbe it would be too much excitement for her at night that way! And then, again, if the mail-train was late it wouldn't get into the night deliv'ry. You know that happened once for Steve and he was real worried about us! Then they might not have deliv'ry at the hospital on Sunday, and she couldn't get it till Monday morning! See? And there's another thing you got to calc'late on, too! You never thought of that! She might be too sick yet to read a letter, or think what to say to it! So just you be patient, Mother!"

"Why, of course!" choked Mother, smiling. "I'm just afraid, Seth, that I'm getting set on her coming, and that isn't right at all, you know, because she mightn't be coming."

"Well, and then again she might. Howsomever, we'll have this room fixed up company fine, and if she don't come we'll just come here and camp for a week, you and me, and pretend we're out visiting. How would that do? Say, it's real pretty here, like spring in the orchard, ain't it, Mother? My! but I'd like to know what she says when she sees it first!"

AND so the two old dears jollied each other along till far past their bedtime; and when at last they lay quiet for the night Mother rose up in the moonlight that was flooding her side of the room and looked cautiously over to the other side of the bed:

"Father! You awake yet?"

"Yes!" sleepily.

"What 'll we do about going to church tomorrow? The telegram might come while we're gone, and then we'd never know what she answered."

"Oh, they'd call up again until they got us. And, anyhow, we'd call them up when we got back and ask if any message had come yet?"

"Oh! Would we?" and Mother Marshall lay down with a sigh of relief.

Anxious inquiry of the telephone after church brought forth no telegram. Dinner was a strained and artificial affair, preceded by a wistful but submissive blessing on the meal. Then the couple settled down in their comfortable chairs, one each side of the telephone, and tried to read, but somehow the hours dragged slowly.

"There's that pair of Grandmother Marshall's andirons up in the attic!" said Mother Marshall, looking up suddenly over the top of the Sunday school Times.

"I'll bring them down the first thing in the morning!" said Father, with his finger on a promise in the Psalms. Then there was silence for some time.

Mother Marshall's eyes suddenly lighted on an article headed "My Class for Boys."

"Seth!" she said, with a beautiful light in her eyes. "You don't suppose maybe she'd be willing to take Stephen's class of boys in Sunday school when she gets better? I can't bear to see them begin to stay away, and Deacon Grigsby admits he don't know how to manage them."

"Why, sure!" said Father, tenderly. "She'll take it, I've no doubt. She's that kind, I should think. And if she isn't now, Mother, she will be after she's been with you awhile!"

"Oh, now, Father!" said Mother, turning pink with pleasure. "Come, let's go up and see how the room looks at sunset."

SO arm in arm they climbed the front stairs and stood looking about on the glorified rosy background with its wilderness of cherry bloom about the frieze. Then suddenly a long-hoped-for, unaccustomed sound burst out belowstairs! The telephone was ringing! It was Sunday evening at sunset, and the telephone was ringing!

Wildly they clutched each other for a moment.

"I'll go, Mother," said Father, in an agitated voice. "You just sit right here and rest till I get back!"

"No! I'll go, too!" declared Mother trotting after. "You might miss something and we ought to write it down!"

In breathless silence they listened for the magic words, Mother leaning close to catch them and trying to scratch them down on a corner of the telephone book with the stump of a pencil she kept for writing recipes:

They read the message over together, and they looked at each another with glad eyes.

"Now, let us pray, Rachel!" said Father, with solemn, shaken voice of joy. And the two lonely old people knelt down by the little table on which stood the telephone and gave thanks to God for the child he was about to send to their empty home.

CHAPTER XX

GILA had counted on an easy victory that evening. She had furnished for the occasion her keenest wit, her sweetest laughter, her finest derision, her most sparkling sarcasm; and as she and her escort joined the motley throng who were patiently making their way into the packed doorway she whetted them eagerly.

Courtland, standing head and shoulders above her, his fine profile outlined against the brightness of the lighted doorway, was looking about with keen interest on the faces of the people, and wondering why they had come. Were they in search of the Presence? Had they, too, felt it there within those dingy walls? He glanced down at Gila with a hope that she, too, might see and understand tonight. What friends they might be—how they might talk these things over together—if only Gila would understand!

He wished she had had better sense than to array herself in such startling garments. He could see the curious glances turned her way; glances that showed she was misunderstood. He did not hear her keen sallies at the expense of their fellow worshipers. He was annoyed and trying by his serious mien to shelter her.

Gila was so amused with her surroundings that she could scarcely pay attention to where she was to sit, and almost tripped over the end of the pew. She openly stared and laughed at the people around her, as though that was what Courtland had brought her there for, and kept nudging him and calling his attention to some grotesque figure.

COURTLAND was singing, joining his fine tenor in with the curious assembly and enjoying it. He was so absorbed in the gathering that her talk scarcely penetrated to his real soul.

If he had been trying to baffle Gila he could have used no more effective method, for the point of her jokes seemed blunted. She turned her eyes at last to her escort and began to study him, astonishment and chagrin in her countenance. Gradually both gave way to a kind of admiration and curiosity. One could not look at Courtland and not admire. She was conscious of a thrill of pleasure in his presence that was new to her. Usually her attitude was to make others thrill at her presence! No man before had caught her fancy and held it like this rare one.

She watched him while he bowed his head in prayer. She must set herself to find and break this other power that had him in its clutches.

Suddenly her ear was caught by the sermon. The ugly little man in the pulpit, with the strange eyes that seemed to look through you, was telling a story of a garden, with One calling, and a pair of naked souls guilty and in fear before Him. It was as though she had been one of them! What right had he to flaunt such truths before a congregation?

SHE was not familiar enough with Bible truths to know where he got the story. It did not seem a story. It was just her Eden where she walked and ate what fruit she might desire every day without a thought of any command that might have been issued. She recognized no commands. What right had God to command her? The serpent had whispered early to her, "Thou shalt not surely die." Her only question was whether the fruit was pleasant to the eyes and a tree to be desired to make one wise. Till now there had been no Lord God walking in her garden in the cool of the day. Only her mother, and she was easy to evade. She had never been really afraid, nor felt her little soul naked till now, with the ugly little man's bright brown eyes upon her, and his words shivering through her like winds about the unprotected. Hideous things she had forgotten flung into view and challenged her; and somewhere in the room there seemed to be One who dared to call her to account. She looked fiercely back to the speaker, her delicate brows drawn darkly, her great blue-black eyes fierce in their intensity, her whole face and attitude a challenge to the sermon. Courtland, absorbed as he was in what the speaker had to say, thrilling with the message that came to his soul welcomely, became aware of the tense little figure by his side, and, looking down, was pleased that she had forgotten her nonsense and was listening, and somehow missed the defiance in her attitude.

Gila did not smile when the service was over. She went out haughtily, impatiently, looking about on the throng contemptuously. When Courtland asked her if she would like to stop a minute and meet the preacher she threw up her chin with a toss and a "No, indeed!" that left no doubt lingering.

OUT in the street, away from the crowd somewhat, she suddenly stopped and stamped her little foot: "I think that man is perfectly disgusting!" she cried. "He ought to be arrested! I don't know why such a man is allowed at large!"

She was fairly panting in her anger. It was as if he had put her to shame before an assembly.

Courtland turned wonderingly toward her.

"He has no right!" she went on, "I hate him!"

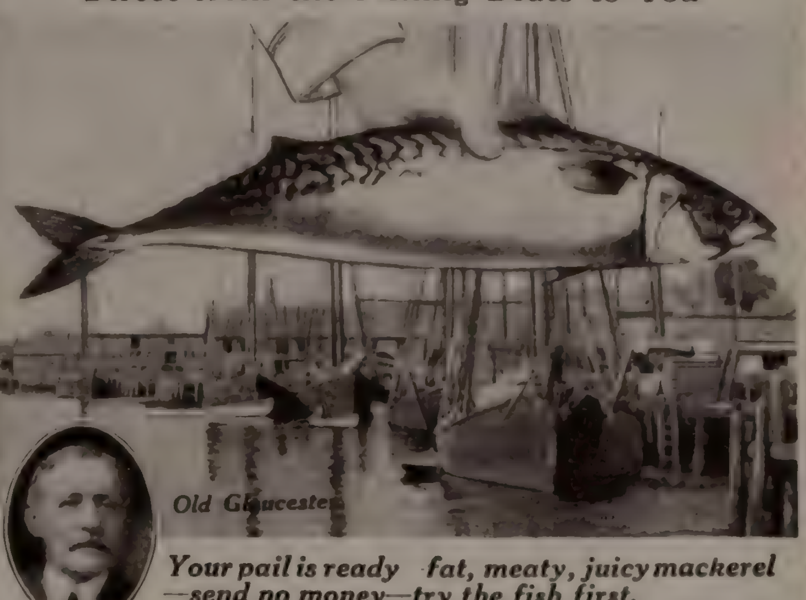
Courtland watched her in amazement. "You can't mean the minister!"

"Minister! He's no minister!" de-

Salt Mackerel

Direct from the Fishing Boats to You



Your pail is ready—fat, meaty, juicy mackerel—send no money—try the fish first.

Frank E. Davis PRESIDENT

It's thirty-three years, come next September, since I began supplying the choicest of Gloucester's famous mackerel direct to the homes of families throughout the country.

Our Own Home Kind

People here in Gloucester, the leading fish port of America, laughed at me when I began to sell mackerel by mail. They didn't realize how hard it is for other people to get good fish. But I did. So I decided to make it easy for everybody, everywhere, to have full-flavored, wholesome fish, the kind we pick for our own eating here at Gloucester. 65,000 families are buying from us today.

Fishmen for Generations

You see, I know fish. My folks, 'way back, have always been fishmen. They helped found Gloucester in 1623. My boyhood days were spent aboard fishing boats. Catching fish, knowing the choicest and picking 'em out, cleaning and curing them the right way, has been my life's job.

Such a Good Breakfast!

A fat, tender, juicy Davis' Mackerel broiled to a sizzling brown; some butter, a sprinkling of pepper, a touch of lemon, if you wish—how good it smells, how tempting it looks, how it tickles the palate, and, oh, how it satisfies!—the favorite breakfast dish of thousands.

Thirty Years' Development

Today our business is housed in a modern, four-story, concrete building, with 20,000 square feet of floor space; fitted with the most improved and sanitary equipment for cleaning and packing fish. Standing at the water's edge, the fishermen's catches are brought right into the building. They go to your table with "the tang of the sea" in them.

Fall Mackerel, Fat and Tender

Most of the fish your dealer can buy are Spring fish, thin, dry, and tasteless. What I've selected for you are Fall fish, juicy and fat with the true salty sea mackerel flavor. We clean and wash them before weighing. You pay only for net weight. No heads and no tails. Just the white, thick, meaty portions—the parts that make the most delicious meal imaginable. You probably have never tasted salt mackerel as good as mine.

Send No Cash—Try the Mackerel First

I want you to know before you pay that my fish will please you. If there is any possibility of a risk, I want it to be at my expense. Just mail the coupon today, and I'll ship at once a pail of my mackerel containing 10 fish, each fish sufficient for 3 or 4 people, all charges prepaid, so that your family can have a real Gloucester treat Sunday morning.

Then—if my mackerel are not better than any you have ever tasted, send back the rest at my expense.

If you are pleased with them—and I'm sure you will be—send me $3.90, and at the same time ask for "Descriptive List of Davis' Fish," sold only direct, never to dealers.

Remember: Meat, flour, potatoes, everything has gone 'way up in price. In comparison, Davis' mackerel is low. An economical food—so good to eat, so nutritious! The "Sea Food Cook Book" that goes with the fish will tell you just how to prepare them.

Mail the coupon now with your business card, letter-head or reference.

clared Gila. "He's a fanatic! The idea of daring to talk about God that way as if he was always around everywhere! I think it's awful! I should think he'd have everybody in hysterics!"

Gila's voice sounded as if she were almost there herself. She flung along by his side with a vindictive little click of her high-heeled boots and a prance of her whole elaborate little person that showed she was fairly bristling with wrath.

But Courtland's voice was sad with disappointment. "Then you didn't feel it, after all! I was hoping you did."

"Feel what?" she asked, sharply.

"Feel the Presence!" He said it gently, reverently, as if it were a magic word, a password to a mutual understanding.

"Presence?" she said, bewildered. "Yes, I felt a presence, but what presence did you mean?"

"The Presence of God."

SHE turned upon him and jerked her arm away. "The Presence of God in that place?" she demanded. "No! Never! How perfectly dreadful! I think that is irreverent!"

"Irreverent?"

"Yes! Very irreverent!" said Gila, piously. "And a man like that is profaning holy things. If you really care for religious things you ought to come to my church, where everything is quiet and orderly and where there are decent people. Why, those people there tonight looked as if they might all be thieves and murderers! And outlandish! My soul! I never saw anything like it! Some of their things must have come out of the Ark! Did you see that girl with the tight green skirt? Imagine it! A whole year and a half out of date! I think it is immodest to wear things when they get out of style like that! And the idea of that man daring to talk to that kind of people about God coming down to live with them! I think it was the limit! As if God cared anything about people of that sort! It's just such talk as that that makes riots and things. My father says so! Getting common, stupid people all worked up about things they can't understand. I think it's wicked!"

Seated finally in the library, for he could not go away yet, Courtland felt, somehow, there was something he must ask her. He turned to her, calling her for the first time by her name:

"But, Gila, you said you felt a Presence. What did you mean?"

Gila was silent. The tumult in her face subsided.

She dropped her lashes and played with the frill on the wrist of the long chiffon sleeve of her blouse. Her eyes beneath their concealing lashes kindled. Her mouth grew sweet and sensitive, her whole attitude became shy and alluring. She sat and drooped before the fire, casting now and then a wide, shy, innocent look up, her face half turned away.

"Does she look adown her apron!" floated the words through his brain. Ah! Here at last was the Gila he had been seeking! The Gila who would understand!

"Tell me, Gila!" he said, in an eager, low appeal.

"It was—you—I meant!" she breathed softly.

He sat up sharply. There was subtle flattery in her tone. He could not fail to be stirred by it.

"Me!" he said, almost sternly. "I don't understand!" but his voice was gentle, almost tender. She looked so small and scared and Solveig-like.

"You meant me!" he said, again. "Won't you please explain?"

CHAPTER XXI

COURTLAND went back to college that night in a tender and exalted mood. He thought he was in love with Gila!

That has been a wonderful little scene before the fire, with the soft, hidden yellow lights above, and Gila with her delicate, fervid little face, great, dark eyes, and shy looks. Gila had risked a tear upon her pearly cheek and another to hang upon her long lashes, and he had had a curious desire to kiss them away; but something held him from it. Instead, he took his clean handkerchief, softly wiping them, and thought that Gila was shy and modest when she shrank from his touch.

He did not take her in his arms. Something held him from it. He had a feeling that she was too sacred, and he must not lightly snatch her for himself. Instead, he put her gently in the big chair by his side, and they sat and talked together quietly.

He had not asked her to marry him, nor even told her he loved her. They had talked in quiet, wondering ways of feeling drawn to each other; at least he had talked, and Gila had sat watching him with deep, dissatisfied eyes. She had sense enough to see that she could not win him with the arts that had won others. His was a nature deeper, stronger. She must bide her time and be coy. But her spirit chafed beneath delay. Perhaps it was this that held him in a sort of uncertainty. It was as if he waited permission from some unseen source to take what she was so evidently ready to give. He thought it was the sacredness in which he held her. Almost the sermon and the feeling of the Presence were out of mind as he went home. There played around him now a little phantom joy that hovered like a will-o'-the-wisp above his heart, and danced, giving him a strange, inexplicable exhilaration. Was this love? Was he in love?

HE flung himself down on Tennelly's couch when he got back to the dormitory. Bill Ward was deep in a book under the drop-light, and Tennelly was supposed to be finishing a theme for the next day.

"'Nelly, what is love?" asked Courtland suddenly, in the midst of the silence. "How do you know when you're in love?"

Tennelly dropped his fountain pen in his surprise, and had to crawl under the table after it. He and Bill Ward exchanged one lightning glance of relief as he emerged from the table.

"Search me!" said Tenelly, as he sat down again. "Love's an illusion, they say. I never tried it, so I don't know."

There was silence again in Tennelly's room. Presently Courtland got up and said good-night. Over in his own room he stood by the window, looking out into the moonlight. The preacher had said prayer was talking with the Lord face to face. That was a new idea. Courtland dropped upon his knees and talked aloud to God as he had never opened his heart to living creature before. If prayer was that, why, prayer was good!

Gila, standing bewildered, studying her pretty, discontented little face in the mirror, with all its masks laid aside, would have shivered in fear and been all the more uncertain of her success if she could have known that the man she would have had for a lover was on his knees talking about her to God. Her little naked soul in a garden all alone with the Lord God, and a man who was set to follow Him!

Conservation in the Camps

THE War Department has taken elaborate and comprehensive precautions to prevent waste in the army cantonments, which will soon contain more than two million men, and in the embarkation camps. In the feeding of the men waste is being minimized through the fact that the food is prepared under the direction of mess cooks, who are being trained by special courses in army cooking schools.

The greatest element of saving is through the garbage. This has been sold for an annual price of $446,394.57. The garbage from thirteen of the cantonments will be used for feeding swine. It is estimated on the basis of experiments conducted at the Chillicothe cantonment, that the garbage waste from ten to fifteen men will feed one hog and enable it to add to its weight one pound per day. At this rate, the garbage from these thirteen cantonments will produce 18,980,000 pounds of pork per year.

When not used for feeding, the garbage will be "reduced," that is, cooked at high temperature, the grease extracted, and the remainder ground and used for fertilizer or feeds.

Adventures in Neighboring

An Opportunity for the Exchange of Experiences Between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Who Are Putting Them into Practice.

TO most of us—especially those of us who live in the country—the late fall is a time of comparative relaxation. It is a peaceful succession of golden days, when neighborly calls (discontinued during the busy summer) are once more exchanged; when club meetings start up again; when housewarmings and weddings and nutting-parties and harvest homes come crowding one on the other's heels. It is, in short, the most "neighborly" time of all the year!

If it were not for the late fall—if we had to jump from summer into winter—many a fine and unselfish plan for community betterment would die unexpressed. These plans come to us all the year round; but in the summer we are too busy and in the winter (often) too isolated by bitter weather or snows.

And so the fall is the time when, with the long winter in prospect, we take a look around us, note the defects, the unhappinesses, the lacks and the tragedies which can be remedied, and then go quietly to work to set in motion whatever will, during the course of the winter, bring about the needed change.

To every rural woman (whether she lives in a town or at a crossroads or out on a farm) who is thus quietly engaged in planning a better and happier winter for her community, may the following letters from women in other parts of the United States be the stimulating challenge—inspiration—they were to me!

THIS first letter is from Connecticut. And the writer has headed it:

A Country Library

"There is a little village where there are only a few homes on the one main street, and which is ten miles from the nearest trolley or steam line. And yet this village is a center to which, twice a week, come a goodly number of people. The occasion is the bi-weekly opening of the village library. It has been housed for several years in a small building (once a meat market) given rent free by the interested owner, who feels that his family of boys get more return from the building as a library than they would if he rented it for other purposes. Willing hands built, or gave, bookcases, reading-table, rugs and stove; and the whole village rallied in an effort to raise the money to stock the shelves.

"That was five years ago. Ever since, it has been opened twice a week, and the best reading-matter—classic and modern—has been at the disposal of all. Several thousand volumes are permanently on the shelves. And by an arrangement with neighboring libraries, recent books of fiction are purchased in common and exchanged.

"Monthly and weekly magazines are subscribed to, and are also given by the state.

"The experiment has succeeded. Young people, to whom only the cheapest of reading matter was available, now read Kipling, Stevenson, Mark Twain. The school teachers have found the library a great help.

"A Library Committee, chosen by the community, is in charge, and selects the books purchased. One member of the committee acts as librarian.

"The interest has been so great that recently $5,000 has been offered this little village for a permanent library building. What this village of a few hundred inhabitants has done, any community can do. All you need is interest and enthusiasm."

OUR next letter-writer lives in the sunny South: in Louisiana; and the account she sends in is immensely worth while. Here is her letter, under her own heading:

How We Put Venetian Blinds in the High School

"A young woman working in the interests of the civics of our state came to our neighborhood and organized a 'League' of some ten members.

"When school opened, the 'League' and the School Board were a reception committee which welcomed the teachers and introduced them to the parents. This was done for the betterment (during the coming term) of all concerned.

"We then saw the many inconveniences about the schoolhouse: the many uncomfortable things the children were having to endure; and we decided to begin to remedy this by first buying Venetian blinds. But the money had to be raised.

"We appointed a committee composed of teachers who had done things or who had good ideas. When this committee reported, it was decided we should have a Tom Thumb wedding.

"The affair was a success. We got the blinds, thereby laying the corner-stone of one of the largest and most-alive Civic Leagues in the state. From this simple beginning has resulted one of the cleanest towns of its size in this section."

AGAIN, just for a moment, we must yield the platform to a Southerner, as the following letter is too good (even though the South has just been ably represented in this column) to hold over until next week. The writer's title for this account is:

A Beat Fair

"Different beats in our county (Rankin) have and are organizing what are called: 'Beat Fairs.' Any one in the 'beat' can be a member, by trying to raise better stock, by canning more, and so on.

"By a majority of votes, by voice, the president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer are elected; and also a committee of ten or fifteen members. The officers and the committee keep closely in touch with one another.

"In October, or some other fall month, the Fair Contest is held. Prizes are offered for the best cattle, horses, hogs, goats, sheep, chickens, farm produce, canning, cooking, and all kinds of needlework.

"Having these fairs in our county throws people together more, makes them work harder, and stimulates competition.

"In the end the members are well repaid, for they have better stock, pure-bred poultry, more farm produce, more canned things, and—best of all—better cooking.

"If any of the readers want to know more about these Beat Fairs, they can write me and I will send them the name and address of the presidents, who would be willing to give any information concerning them."

I hope some of the readers of the Christian Herald will avail themselves of this opportunity, so heartily offered. Address: Miss Annye Wynn, Brandon, Mississippi (Rural Delivery No. 2).

THERE is room this week for just one more "Adventure in Neighboring." This time the writer takes a community festivity for her subject: a party which must have been endless fun for the community. For this letter tells us about:

A Gipsy Camp

"Realizing that there was too little enjoyment among the folks of our community, we women met and planned to hold a Gipsy Camp. The women and children dressed as gipsies. The grounds were lighted by three immense gas lights, with ropes strung across, overhead, on which were hung bright-colored Japanese lanterns.

"At 8:30 the ladies and children formed in line at one side of the grounds, and, led by one 'gipsy' playing an accordion, marched all about. Shetland ponies added much to the picturesqueness of this parade.

"The men had brought their market wagons (covered ones which looked much like gipsy vans), and one of these was used as a stage from which recitations were given. The lunch was served from another 'van,' and consisted of a bun-sandwich, a banana, a pickle, cake, and cheese: all wrapped in a red bandanna handkerchief. The price of this was twenty-five cents. Coffee and ice-cream were served at tents on the grounds, five cents being charged for the coffee and ten cents for the ice-cream. Another tent held fortune-tellers, who, by the light of a tallow candle, read (for five cents) the palms of the guests. In still another tent were sold common-sense articles and fancy work.

"We had advertised this affair all over the country by means of posters; and we had a large crowd. After all expenses were paid, we had one hundred and twenty-seven dollars to use for the betterment of the community."

WHEN I finished this letter, I was filled with curiosity—plain woman's curiosity—to know how that one hundred and twenty dollars was used. Undoubtedly the same thought has occurred to you. So I suggest we find out! I shall write to the writer, asking her to relieve our suspense. I have a feeling that there's another inspiring story in the spending of that money. Perhaps I can have her answer in time for next week's column. If not, the column will be crowded with other earnest accounts of service on the part of women who have, indeed, loved their "neighbors" as "themselves."

UNUSUAL RENEWAL OFFERS

The Pictorial Life of Christ

Eighty Magnificent Sculptural Illustrations by the Famous Italian Master-Sculptor

DOMENICO MASTRIOANNI

THESE magnificent pictures are not paintings. They are something finer. The originals are combinations of sculpture and sculptural reliefs done in wax and clay and wonderfully grouped and photographed in such a way as to bring out in sharp contrast the lights and shadows and perspectives. The resulting photograph is something absolutely and entirely different in the history of art. There is a depth of space realized in looking at these pictures that you have never known in looking at a drawing or painting.

In simple, attractive language, the story of the life of Jesus is told by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd, who has adhered faithfully to the narrative in the Gospels. He is a lucid and sympathetic writer and gives a clear conception of the social, religious and political conditions in Galilee during the time Christ was upon earth. No expense has been spared in producing a book worthy in every respect of these wonderful pictures. The binding is an extremely handsome design in white vellum with red and blue letters. Size, 7 x 10 inches.

Nehemiah's Prayer Answered

International Sunday School Lesson for November 18
Neh. 2 : 1-11

In the Day of Opportunity

By Rev. George D. Allison

THERE is a significant contrast between the heart-broken man of the first verses of the Book of Nehemiah, and the ready, purposeful leader revealed in the second chapter. Between the two came Nehemiah's prayer. Prayer, the bridge between despair and resolution, between grief and hope, between aimlessness of life and a sense of divine commission to serve. Today we study a man whom opportunity found ready and waiting, because his prayer life was true. That alone is lesson enough for us. If we are unready, or if we think that no task is ours, let us look first to see if we are communing with God as we might.

The Long Delay

Nehemiah was no rash enthusiast, to rush into the king's presence with a wild petition. When his chance came, it was no act of impulse, but the carrying out of a plan. Probably during the four months that had intervened, he had sought other Jews and discussed other methods. Possibly he looked for a suitable leader. But he found none. And as he prayed and meditated, "day and night" he says in his diary, the conviction grew upon him that God wanted him to do this piece of work himself. His call came like that of most of us, by the steady formation of a sense of responsibility that must be met, rather than by any sudden vision of the night.

Speaking Faces

The cupbearer did not have to beg an interview with the king. His countenance was expressive of a hidden longing only waiting for words. It was uncourtly for a servant in the palace to manifest any personal feeling, especially of sadness. Nehemiah writes: "I had not been sad in his presence." Unconsciously he showed the king his heart. And that absolute monarch was not heartless himself. His inquiry was so kindly that Nehemiah knew his chance was come. Fearlessly he spoke: "Why should not my countenance be sad when my fatherland lies desolate?" It was a brave word for a captive exile to speak to the conqueror. But back of it was so much more that the king himself led the way by asking, "For what dost thou make request?"

An Anxious Moment and an Emergency Prayer

Nehemiah's heart leaped into his throat. He had a sickening sense of fear as he realized that the moment had come and his whole enterprise hung on the response winning the favor of his capricious master. The king had seen that his courtier had a plan. He might be angry and resentful; it seemed scarcely possible that he would fall in with the idea.

The cupbearer did not seem to hesitate or falter before he set forth his request. But there had been time for an appeal for aid to travel from earth to heaven in that tense and anxious second of pause. "So I prayed to the God of Heaven." There was no time for words. There was no stately petition or pious phrase. Perhaps, like Luther before another emperor, he only ejaculated, "I can do no other: God help me!" More likely still, his whole heart turned to God without even a mental formula of words.

So we see this practical man of affairs, a master in two realms of prayer—in the steadfast, meditative, long-continued supplication that penetrates into the unseen, and in the ability to turn to God from the daily task with an instant sense of power not his own. Now, this I believe is true: that the former makes the latter possible. The man who only prays in emergencies gets little help even then. The man who continues a life of daily intercession can get mighty strength on the street or in the shop when the testing-time comes.

A Straightforward Request

"What do I ask? That you send me back to my own land to rebuild Jerusalem." There was no beating about the bush there! In one sentence his audacious appeal was before King Artaxerxes. The very straightforwardness of it was irresistible. The man on the throne was used to all sorts of roundabout attempts to get favors. So is every man who dispenses offices or money or power. If you have anything to ask, out with it! So sincere was the petitioner that the Persian monarch realized that patriotism and devotion were speaking, and not greed or pride. Nehemiah really asked nothing for himself and everything for his cause. He was too intent and too devoted to take time even to try to look modest. He was transfigured by his zeal.

Why not allow this attempt? The man was loyalty itself, and a rebuilt city was an asset to the kingdom. This was too good a man to lose. The only qualification of the King was that, if the request was granted, Nehemiah must come back! Such men were in demand, and for more than cupbearing at that.

When we are on errands of religion and patriotism, we must purge our hearts of all self-seeking and reward. Even a heathen must be able to see our absolute sincerity. If to us the task is everything, and we are not our own, we cannot lose or fail.

Ready for Action

How practical Nehemiah was! Many an enthusiast would have had no plan of campaign. This man struck when the iron was hot. He set a definite time for the work. He pressed home his advantage. He wanted passports at once and royal authority for his well-laid plans. He wanted a requisition on the state forest reserves for the necessary timber for his construction of fortifications.

This is true preparedness. Nehemiah believed in planning your work, then in working your plan. Let us apply this to our spiritual enterprises.

"I set him a time." Many a church and Bible school drifts without a program. Successful enterprises are conducted by pastors and workers who know what they are to do for weeks and months to come. McGarragh's book, "A Modern Church Program," has put many a church on the clue of efficiency in service. Our own church has been at work on a Fall Campaign: September Keynote—Spiritial Preparation. October Keynote—Mobilizing our Forces (Rally Day, Every Member Canvass, Study Groups, Soul Winners). November Keynote—Enlisting Others. This is concentration and planning. So with the "Winter Work" program to follow. It is not mechanical to say "Twenty-five new members by Thanksgiving and Fifty by Christmas." I set him a time.

The New Governor

So, to quote the diary of this grand man, "the good hand of God was upon me." He thanked God and took courage. And courage he needed for all that was in store. In Jerusalem, he did not hastily commit himself to any one, but studied the situation.

How thrilling is the account in his own words, from the diary, of his midnight journey around the city, attended only by a small bodyguard! The term "survey of the field" is modern, but Nehemiah may be a pattern for us in the doing of the thing itself. He faced all the possible difficulties bravely. He investigated for himself, and could not be taken by surprise afterward. He looked at the worst hindrances, and all the surprises were happy ones. He found out who were his enemies and opponents, and who were loyal helpers. Then he set to work.

Are we as wise as he? We are builders too, "building for eternity," we sing. We are reformers as well as this ancient patriot. Have we surveyed our chosen field? Individually, have we looked over our church, our town, and said, "Lord, what wouldst thou have me to do?" As fellow workers have our Sunday school teachers and officers, in conference assembled, surveyed the field we serve, planned to reach out for more children, planned to teach better those we have? As a church member, do you believe your church needs to imitate Nehemiah and study the town where your temple stands, with all its rubbish, its Sanballats and Tobiahs, its indifferent children of the Lord?

Nehemiah's Rallying Cry

Burned gates, broken walls, littered streets, discouraged Jews, cynical enemies, and one brave, consecrated man! "The God of heaven, he will prosper us." There is the rallying cry that wins, reviving hope, "strengthening hands for the good work." God wills it. "We are God's fellow workers."

So we see how a man of prayer became a man of action. How his mightiest prayer was answered by giving him his hardest task and divine aid in performing it. Later we shall study, more carefully I trust than we ever have before, how he did his work. For heavy duties wait in our day for loyal followers of Jesus Christ.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Mothers' Association and Mothers' Libraries

THE public school has too largely monopolized relationship to mothers through Mothers' Associations and Clubs. There is no reason why the Sunday school should not establish similar relations for highest purposes.

It may surprise many to know that such Sunday School Mothers' Associations have existed for years and have been a valued help to mothers and teachers. Best of all, the plan can be worked in the smallest school, in every school.

How to begin. It is a good plan first to invite to a week afternoon or evening meeting all the mothers of children in the Elementary Departments, or say up to twelve years of age. The teachers of the children should be there, and the pastor and school superintendent. The plan of the association should be explained, namely, to unite parents, teachers and officers for religious and social purposes.

The usual officers should be elected, and Membership, Program and Library Committees appointed, or one committee for the three purposes. It is a question whether dues should be asked. The better plan is a voluntary offering at each monthly meeting for libraries, refreshments and incidental expenses.

Program. Excellent suggestions will be found in "Plans for Mothers' and Parents' Meetings," (Sunday School Times Co., Phila. 5 cents), and "Mothers' Associations," (The Pilgrim Press, Boston). The usual plan is to meet once a month and divide the time into devotional, educational and social periods.

May I suggest an order of service for the ordinary meetings: Devotional service. Minutes of last meeting. Treasurer's report. Business. Music. Topic for study. Discussion. Social time. Adjournment.

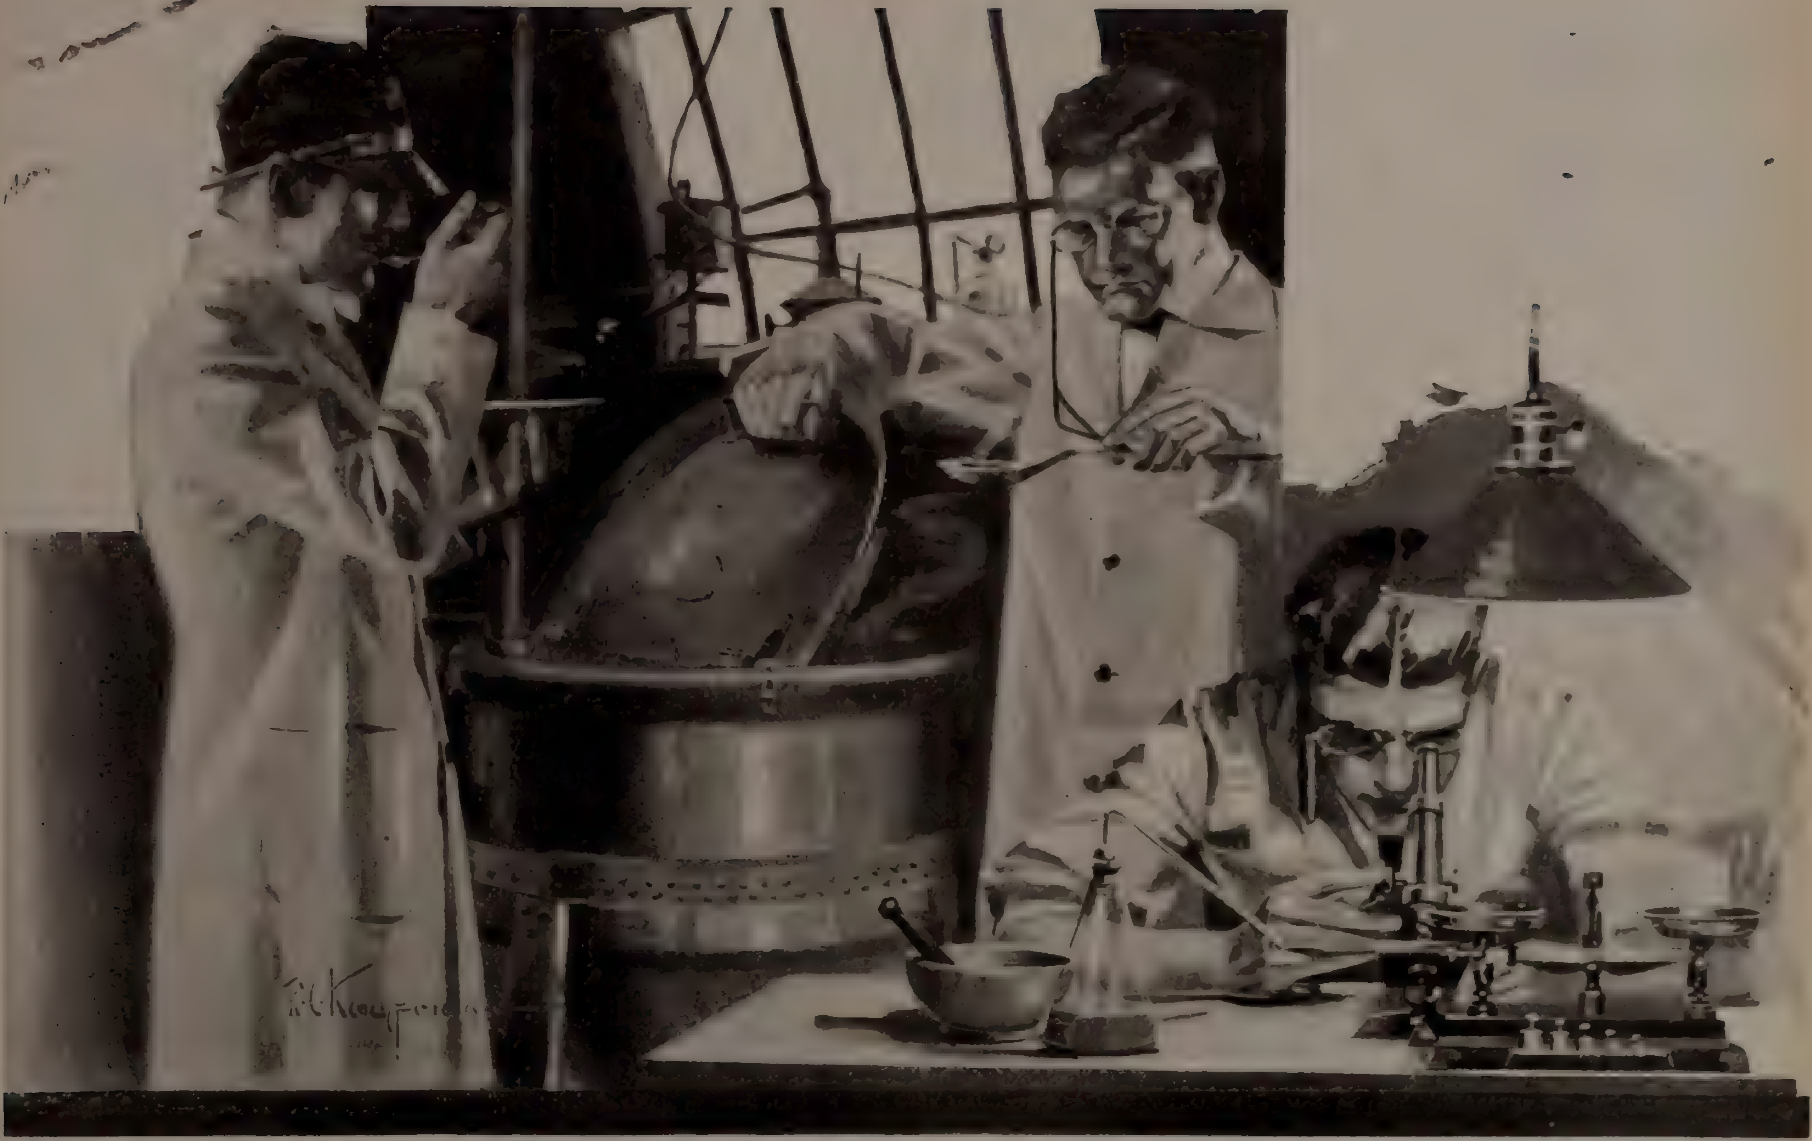
The following program topics are suggestive: October, "The Value of Mothers' Meetings." November, "Bed-time Stories. What to Tell and How." December, "Christmas Giving." January, "The Training of the Will." February, "Parents' Meeting. Fathers expected." March, "Religious Training of Children in the Home." April, "Children's Prayers." May, "God in Nature."

October, "The Religion of a Child." November, "How to Lead Children to Christ." December, "The Child as God's Child." January, "Formation of Habits." February, Parents' Meeting. "Making the Boy a Good Citizen." March, "Perplexing Questions." April, "Our Duty to Other Peoples' Children." May, "The Twilight Hour, the Mother's Opportunity."

Books for study through the winter: "The Unfolding Life," Mrs. Lamoreaux, (The Westminster Press, 75 cents). "A Study of Child Nature," Harrison (Chicago Kindergarten College, $1). "Child Nature and Child Nurture," St. John (Pilgrim Press, 50 cents).

Lessons may be presented from the mothers of the Bible, such as Hannah, Rebekah, Jochebed, Naomi, Lois and Eunice, Elizabeth, Mary. These character topics may be presented in the following program: Hannah—Mother of Samuel. Home reading for mothers. I Sam. 1 to 2 : 22. Compare Hannah's song of thankfulness with the magnificat of Mary, (Luke 1). Topic for meeting: Early Conservation of Children. Keeping of promises. Discussion.

Library. Part of the monthly offering should go to the purchase of books to form a circulating mothers' library. A fine list of books is suggested in the pamphlet referred to above, "Plans for Mothers' and Parents' Meetings."



New Style Cookery

Which is Bound to Supersede the Old

Done by Experts, College Trained. Pedigreed Materials, Selected by Analysis. Formulas Perfected by a Thousand Tests.

Any Van Camp dish of nowadays is a revelation in scientific cookery. But the supreme creation, probably, is Van Camp's Pork and Beans. The Van Camp kitchens are now directed from a model laboratory. The Van Camp cooks are college-trained scientific experts. The formulas used are elaborate and exacting. Every detail is minutely specified. With some of this it has taken years to attain the superlative flavor. Materials are selected by analysis. Seeds and soils are studied to produce the best.

The dishes never vary. Each is exactly like the model dish adopted.

Thrice-Better Foods

This means that scientific methods are at last applied to cookery. Guesswork is abandoned. Every detail is developed to the pinnacle of excellence. And the final result is a thrice-better dish than the old methods ever developed.

Any new Van Camp dish, when you try it, will mark an epoch in your home. It will win you to scientific cookery. One dish will urge another. You will gain a new conception of what perfect cooking means.

Those delights will be perpetual. The dishes never vary. So these same flavors, these same qualities are always at your command. Please learn, for your own sake, how they differ from the ordinary foods.

Try Our Queen Dish—
Van Camp's Pork and Beans

For 25 years our sovereign dish has been Van Camp's Pork and Beans. See what scientific cookery does for that. The beans are grown on rare soils, extra-rich in nitrogen. Each lot is analyzed before we start to cook. Thus we know exactly how to treat it. The water used is freed from minerals. Ordinary water makes digestion difficult.

The baking is done by super-heated steam, which does not touch the beans. Thus a high heat is applied, and applied for hours, without crisping or bursting the beans.

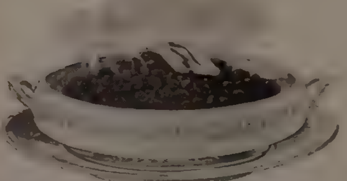
The tomato sauce is a surprising creation. It is the final result of testing 856 formulas. It is baked with the beans, so its tang and zest and flavor permeate the dish.

Here are baked beans as they should be. They will change your whole conception of this dish.

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce
THREE SIZES

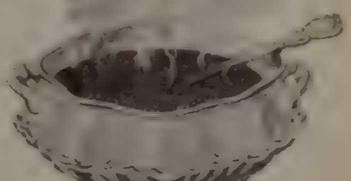
Prepared in the Van Camp Kitchens at Indianapolis



Van Camp's Pork and Beans
A new-style dish which will make baked beans many times as popular as a substitute for meat.

Van Camp's Peanut Butter
A new-method product which will surprise and delight the lovers of peanut butter.

Van Camp's Spaghetti
Made in Italian style, but with a flavor far excelling any Neapolitan creation



Van Camp's Soups
18 kinds—each a masterpiece. Made from formulas perfected by a thousand tests.

MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

CORRESPONDENTS, like poets, are born, not made. Maynard Owen Williams, whose articles appear exclusively in the Christian Herald, has the born correspondent's ability to observe and the capacity to understand something of the genius of the people among whom he is. More than that, he has the sympathetic attitude of a sincere Christian, and a vital Christian love for truth. Having observed and understood, he can so tell it that the rest of us also see and understand.

VITAL HUMAN STORIES FROM RUSSIA

is the title of a series of articles by Mr. Williams now appearing in the

CHRISTIAN HERALD

Do you want to know how the Russian Church, deprived of the protection of autocracy, is meeting the challenge of democracy? Williams will tell you in the Christian Herald.

Do you want to see the Great Russian Council, yet to be called, build a people's government on the shattered foundations of a Czar's authority? Williams will show you in the Christian Herald.

Do you want to understand the mind and heart of the Slav, feared as a menace by so many generations of western Europeans, now leading them all in his devotion to Liberty and the rights of men? Williams will make it plain in the Christian Herald.

At the time of the Russian Revolution, Mr. Williams was in China completing his articles about the Orient for the Christian Herald. He went to Petrograd at once. From Harbin, the far Eastern port, Mr. Williams sent several articles which have helped the readers of the Christian Herald to understand the new Russia.

Mr. Williams' articles alone, during the coming year, will be worth many times the cost of the Christian Herald.

WHY 300,000 FAMILIES LOVE CHRISTIAN HERALD

THE Christian Herald is doing something more than merely placing interesting reading matter in the homes of its readers. It is giving them a part in great enterprises. It is giving them spiritual and material helpfulness. It is the one magazine that represents in the most vital way all of the interests of Protestant Christianity and of the on-marching church of Christ. Week by week, the Christian Herald is giving its readers issues of absorbing interest.

You should be a regular reader of the Christian Herald and enjoy these special features which are now appearing:

THE MILLENNIUM—What, When and Where. An Additional Series of Articles on Prophecy by America's Greatest Expositor, Prof. James M. Gray, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago.
THE GREATER UNITED STATES. By Frank G. Carpenter.

The Pre-Reformation Dark Ages

THE average historian assigns the period usually known as the "dark ages" to the centuries from the ninth to the eleventh, during which there was a very marked decline of European civilization, brought about by the influx of the barbarian hordes. It is not, however, this period, but that which preceded the Reformation, with which Dr. Theodore Graebner deals in his new book just issued under the title of "The Dark Ages." As a perusal of the volume discloses, the title is well chosen, since in these later ages—the thirteenth to the fifteenth—as he points out, "the paraphernalia of religion had all but completely crushed out the spirit of faith, and had, to a great extent, usurped the place of morality."

It is astonishing how little is known today by the average person regarding pre-Reformation conditions, social, religious and economic. We are apt to apply the phrase, "the good old times," somewhat indiscriminately to everything in the past; but certainly the periods dealt with in Dr. Graebner's book were anything but "good times." He discloses, in scholarly and convincing fashion, the actual world conditions when Christianity and civilization were under a cloud. He sets before us a series of descriptive pictures of successive events in realistic and vivid terms.

"The time was characterized by a debased Christianity, a multiplied religiosity, a great burden of images and pictures, saints and festivals," with hardly enough working days for the poor man to procure the necessaries of life. The clergy multiplied amazingly. Cologne had twenty-two monasteries and convents, nineteen big churches, and 100 chapels; and more than 1,000 masses were said daily. Everywhere it was the same. The clergy in numbers were like the locusts in Egypt, while in power they were proclaimed as mediators between God and man. Money flowed into the church's coffers; endowments innumerable made it enormously rich. Everything was made to yield financial profit, prayers included. The state of religion in Europe is described by Dr. Graebner with amazing detail. It was the heyday of indulgences, of miraculous relics, of imaginary legends to heighten the wonder and excite the credulity of the simple, and of various forms of religious insanity and blood-madness, much of which was directed against the Jews.

Social and intellectual conditions in medieval Europe at that time, the author compares with those that recently existed in modern Mexico. The clergy, as usual, resisted educational progress. An antiquated scholasticism ruled in the universities. Physical and medical sciences were at a standstill. Tillers of the land were in peonage, and many were slaves and actually sold with the soil. Numbers who had been freemen were made serfs to bishops and abbots. To crown all, the morals of the age, from a modern viewpoint at least, were indescribable. "The chronicles of the period," writes Dr. Graebner, "were filled with deeds of cruelty, perfidy, and revenge, so wild and enormous as almost to exceed belief."

It was an age in which human life was held at little value. The upper classes, debauched and tyrannous, ruled mercilessly, and any attempt of the peasants to better their own condition was suppressed in blood. One shudders at the record of massacre and rapine, and the diabolic cruelties which only Satanic natures could have invented. In certain large trading cities, there was "comparative prosperity and even civil freedom," where the citizens, by wealth and energy, had gained a certain amount of independence; but these were luminous exceptions to the general rule.

Three times in the century before the Reformation, great councils were held for the purpose of reforming society and the church. Conditions had become intolerable everywhere, and a general revolution was feared.

Such is the terrible picture Dr. Graebner presents of conditions in the pre-Reformation age, and which he fortifies by abundant quotations from the historians and chroniclers of the time, and also from later authorities.

It is now four hundred years since "the curtain was rung down" on such spectacles, yet the facts, as this book relates them, have a special interest for every lover of humanity and justice. Their recital anew, in this anniversary year of Luther's great work, affords the fullest opportunity to contrast the changed order with what immediately preceded it. And this book not only describes with the greatest detail the state of the church and the power of the clergy of that critical period, but also the operation of the spiritual courts, the traffic in pardons, and many other circumstances which the student of history and religion should know. It is the old story in a new setting, from the pen of a capable historian, who has brought to his task the support of all the best evidence available, and who has been scrupulously careful in all his statements. The volume is issued by the Concordia Publishing House, St. Louis. Price, paper covers, 35 cents, including postage.

Lift men up, and they may bear you upon their shoulders to success; drag them down, and you may fall with them into the mire.

A New National Bible Picture Study

Marking a Further Advance in Home Bible Instruction, under a Method That Will be Welcomed by Every Member of the Christian Herald Family.

will begin shortly in the

CHRISTIAN HERALD

EVERY lover of the Bible will read with intense interest and great pleasure of the Christian Herald new plan for Pictorial Bible Study, to be conducted this winter. This is our first announcement of the event; in succeeding issues we will tell about it in greater detail.

As in our first two Bible Picture Studies, we will offer cash rewards to excite a friendly rivalry among our friends as to which shall excel. There will be pictures, as before, but there will be only 30 pictures in all—half as many as in previous competitions. You will be surprised and delighted with the new plan!

THE NEW SUNDAY LESSONS PLAN

Our third Pictorial Bible Study will be founded upon the Bible, the International Sunday School Lessons and the Daily Home Readings—a collection of verses selected by a committee of the most eminent Bible scholars.

The reference book will contain these verses, and from them participants will select those that are best illustrated by the pictures.

So there will be a double gain for Bible lovers—not only will they be learning more of the eternal Word, but they will be acquainting themselves also with the selection of verses chosen by our leaders of religious thought to comprise the Sunday School Lessons of the world!

Reserve Your Outfit Now

A complete outfit will be given with a year's subscription to the Christian Herald, at 10 cents extra. Send in your renewal now and we will enroll your name in the National Bible Picture Study. An outfit with complete information will be sent to you just as soon as the books are ready to be distributed. How to Avoid Colds

By Dr. W. H. VAIL

TO take cold, or to "catch cold," is among the commonest experiences of mankind, especially at this season of the year; therefore to learn how to avoid taking cold is a very desirable end to be accomplished. Not that colds in themselves are dangerous, but, especially among children, they may become the stepping-stones to more serious and even fatal diseases.

The common cold, like other ailments, is dignified with a special germ or bacillus, without which the cold cannot occur, and this germ cannot cause the cold unless certain conditions are present. We are now considering that class of colds which affect the mucous membranes of the head, nasal passages and throat, or the tubes of the lungs. When we have a cold affecting any of these membranes, nature, true to her instincts, immediately attempts to cure the trouble herself, causing the system to throw off the poison by secreting an abundance of mucus. The removal of this mucus, loaded with the disease germs, from the system causes the coughing and expectoration. The inhaling, by other persons, of these germs which are being thrown off by one suffering from the cold, is the way in which the disease spreads through families and neighborhoods.

Colds, like other diseases, obey the laws of contagion and infection under certain conditions. The germs of no disease can thrive and cause contagion or infection where there is an ample supply of pure fresh air. This explains why colds become so prevalent just as soon as we close our doors and windows on the approach of cool weather. It is then that all contagious and infectious diseases begin their reign of terror.

Our homes are truly a menace to our lives. As far as possible we hermetically seal our houses, excluding heaven's life-giving air. We put on double windows on the outside, and hang heavy draperies on the inside, all of which is contrary to the laws of health: but then it is in accordance with the dictates of fashion, and health must always be subservient to fashion, you know.

A FEW years ago ten Indian chiefs came to Hampton Institute, in Virginia, where so many Indian young people are educated. The principal chief made a speech before the Institute, the burden of which was thankfulness for all the benefits which the government was bestowing upon the young Indians. "But," he said, with marked emphasis, "we do not want you to educate our boys and girls in these buildings. Educate them out of doors, in the fresh air. You teach them here many good things, preparing them for useful lives; but they come home and die of tuberculosis. Give them fresh air." And he was right, absolutely. All travelers among wild tribes, even in the arctic regions, testify to the fact that pneumonia is almost unknown among such peoples. When will we learn the importance of rendering our systems immune to these germs by keeping our lungs filled with pure air? Sleep out of doors during the warmer months, if you can, and in the colder seasons have your sleeping-rooms filled with fresh air, if you desire to enjoy health and efficiency. Hunters and trappers will wade in water all day, and sleep all night in their wet garments and yet not catch cold.

NEXT to fresh air, as a preventive of taking cold, comes proper exercise. If you wish to exorcise disease you must exercise the muscular system; for it is mainly by exercising our muscles that we are able to eliminate, directly or indirectly, poisons from the body; and if you keep your system free from the accumulations of effete matters, you will practically be immune to the microbes of all forms of disease, which include colds. This is one of the blessings that accompany work, and all of our outdoor sports tend in the same direction.

In this connection, remember the prime necessity of keeping the body erect, thus enabling the lungs to be properly expanded and filled with air at every inspiration. It is a splendid practice several times each day to take deep breaths of air, thoroughly expanding the lungs and holding the air in them for a few seconds, thus renewing the air in the minute air cells, cleansing them and expelling any microbes that are so constantly invading and occupying any part of the system that is neglected by us in our careless way of breathing.

Few are aware of the importance of properly clothing our bodies to prevent taking cold. There are two points always to be kept in mind when thinking of proper clothing. First, all clothing must be porous, or pervious, and the other is that the extremities should be kept warm. If we recall the fact that when we live proper lives the skin exudes as much moisture in the twenty-four hours as the lungs do, and that the lungs and skin eliminate as much moisture as the kidneys, we see how imperative it is that we take the proper care of the skin, so that it may perform its natural functions. The wearing of impervious garments prevents the escape of the perspiration and tends to disease. If we decide to wear only porous clothing, we must exclude furs from our wardrobes; but this would upset the fashions, which would never do. And we wear furs around our necks, just the place where they should never be worn, for the neck never suffers from cold, naturally. We constantly neglect the extremities, allowing them to become cold, while we wrap our necks with the skins of animals.

A WORD respecting bathing as a means of keeping the skin in proper condition for resisting colds. Take a plunge into cold water, or use the cold shower bath, if it gives you a glowing sensation and you feel invigorated. Avoid everything that produces a chill. Let the temperature of the water be such as is pleasing and invigorating. The frequency of bathing should depend upon the habits and occupation of the individual. Too frequent bathing, and remaining too long a time in the water, are often injurious to the health.

Naturally, our food should be more oily and mucilaginous during the colder seasons of the year. Many believe they are able to ward off colds, to a certain extent, by eating two or three hard pure gumdrops each day. Others favor the use of onions as a preventive. You know, they say, that "an apple a day will keep the doctor away," and "an onion a day will keep everybody away." There is no doubt of the importance of keeping the organs of secretion and excretion in good and regular operation. And our diet should include more oil, salt and water, in order that this end may be accomplished. By all means keep the bowels regular through the use of these three agents, in one form or another. And this includes fruits, nuts and raisins.

THE Food Administration is to undertake an investigation of the sisal and hemp industry with a view to reduction of prices. The price has been forced up 500 per cent. since the war began.

The Food Administration has perfected plans by which salesmen shall be organized for spreading the conservation measures advocated by the Administration. They will push the sale of foodstuffs that can be used as wholesome substitutes for wheat and other commodities of which there is a shortage. They will show the retailers how to make attractive displays of corn meal, potatoes, beans, and other products of which there may be a sufficient supply or a surplus. They will bring home to retailers the imperative necessity of eliminating all extra delivery service. The credit evil, particularly the long credits given by retail grocers to their customers, will also be attacked in this way. The waste and loss from this evil can hardly be overestimated.

IN A SAFE NEIGHBORHOOD

"MR. NORWOOD, most all the color came out of that shirting-material I bought here the first time it was washed. Just look at this shirt."

"I am glad you brought it back, Mrs. Brown. That whole lot of shirting went wrong. Since the war the manufacturers have been having no end of trouble with their dyes—but they'll make good. Will you try this white shirting in its place, or shall I give you your money back?"

What a comfort it is to do business with honest merchants, like those in your own town men who are good neighbors in every sense!

The Christian Herald's advertising standard is based on an extension of this honest, make-good merchandising — our neighborhood is bigger, that's the only difference.

When our subscribers buy from our advertisers they get precisely what they pay for.

Mistakes are human, but whenever a Christian Herald advertiser makes one it will be promptly rectified. The Christian Herald unqualifiedly guarantees this. You are in a safe neighborhood when you buy from our advertisers.

Soldiers and Sailors Fund

GOOD works are contagious. When the spirit of well doing once gets started in a community, the fire spreads quickly. This is what has happened in our appeal for sending Testaments and Christian Heralds to our soldier and sailor boys. The whole Christian Herald Family Circle seems to have become enthusiastic over this project and every mail is bringing scores of letters to show that they are mindful not only of their patriotic duty as good American citizens, but of their spiritual duty to spread the Kingdom as well.

We wish we could give space to those splendid letters. "I am greatly interested in our soldier boys," writes a lady in Dryden, Wash. "My father served three years in the Civil War and I am very proud of it."

A reader in Tower City, provides ten soldiers or sailors with Testaments, and wishes the whole enterprize godspeed. "I haven't a child in the world," writes an Indiana friend, "but I love every mother's son that is in our army, and though I know they will not all come back, I want them to meet in that land were there will be no more sorrow."

An old Christian lady in New Jersey sends a gold dollar, a long-time keepsake, to give Testaments to the men at the front, and prays that God may bless her gift.

A good soul in New Hampshire pays for five Testaments with instructions where to send them.

A reader in Kansas City, Mo., who sends a gift for a number of Testaments, writes: "The Word is of so much comfort to me daily that I want to do something to give it to others, and hope that my gift may bring comfort and cheer to at least a few young men among our soldiers and sailors."

And so with hundreds of others. Thanksgiving is near and we look for a huge flotilla of gifts for the Fund as Thanksgiving offerings, which will doubtless rejoice the heart of many a mother's boy in the cantonments or at the front.

Address all remittances to the Christian Herald Soldiers and Sailors Fund, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

AN INTERESTING LETTER

U. S. S. ———, October 17, 1917.

The Christian Herald, Bible House, N. Y. C.

Your letter of the 28th ultimo is at hand, having been forwarded to me from Norfolk, Va I shall be happy to co-operate with you in any way possible in regard to the distribution of Testaments and subscriptions to the Christian Herald. Your paper is an old friend of mine, and metaphorically speaking your letter slapped me on the back and gripped my hand in a way that made me smile a bit more than usual. For days I had been facing the problem of getting Testaments for the boys on board and could not seem to find a way, when, "Ahoy, there!" shouts your letter, and flings me a line with a big efficient life-buoy on the end of it Thanks!

I have been on the ——— only a short time, so will not at present be able to give you the names of the men of the service who would appreciate a subscription to the Christian Herald. But I will make out a list in the future and send it to you In the meantime, however, if you will send three copies each week to me, I will see that one of them goes to the Ship's Library, one to the Sick Bay, and one to the Chaplain's Office where they will not only be appreciated, but will be well used.

I almost hesitate to ask for Testaments, for I need so many of them. I could use four hundred, but I will only ask for two hundred, and perhaps I will find the others somewhere else. There is an honest need for Testaments here. The lads of the Navy are great-hearted boys, and the manly Christ makes a strong appeal to them. They want to know more about Him.

Very cordially yours,

WILLIAM W. EDEL, Chaplain, U. S. N

How to Reduce Your Weight

You CAN do it in a dignified, scientific way in the privacy of your room and surprise your family and friends.

I KNOW you can, because I've reduced 35,000 women from 20 to 86 lbs., and what I have done for so many I can do for you.

Don't reduce by drugs or diet alone. You'll look old if you do. You should have work adapted to your condition.

No woman need carry one pound of excess fat. It is so simple to weigh what you should, and you enjoy the process. My cheerful letters and your scales keep you enthused.

I build your vitality, strengthen your heart and teach you how to stand, walk and breathe correctly, as I reduce you.

Don't endure fat when it is so easy to reduce.

If you send me your height and weight I'll tell you just what you should weigh. No charge—and I'll send you an illustrated booklet FREE, showing you how to stand correctly. Write me. I will respect your confidence.

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters nor to those written with lead pencil

Questions and Answers

C., Medina, Ohio. Is it not true that without consecration we cannot live holy lives? We cannot live sinners and die saints; if we would die holy, we must live holy lives. We can no more be Christians without consecration than we could be soldiers without enlisting. If we are Christians we shall live holy lives seven days in the week. Again, is not the root of all sin selfishness? Sin has many branches, but one root. Even Christ pleased not himself; and Paul says, if he pleased himself, he would not be the servant of Christ.

Selfishness, or inordinate self-love, being indulged until it practically rules the life of the individual, leads him, for the sake of personal reputation or advantage, to disregard the rights and feelings of others. One who is ruled by selfishness never gives a thought to the question, "Who is my neighbor?" or "What can I do to help others?" In the widest sense, it may be said that all sins are founded, to a greater or less extent, on selfishness.

Mrs. L. M. M., Montana. 1. Genuine morocco leather is made from goatskin, tanned with sumach. It is named after the city of Morocco in North Africa. This leather is distinguished for pliancy, fineness and toughness of texture which fit it particularly for bookbinding and upholstery. 2. The date on which the answers to the Second Bible Picture Study will be printed is not yet settled.

Reader, Natural Bridge Station, Va. When, how and by whom was our system of reckoning time adopted?

As long ago as 1200 B. C. the Egyptians divided the day and night into hours, much after the same manner as we ourselves now do; hence it is not improbable that the Israelites knew this method of time division. The "sundial of Ahaz," mentioned in Scripture, implies a division of this kind. While there was considerable difference in the ancient methods of reckoning the months and years, authorities hold that as early as the time of the Flood the year was reckoned on the basis of 360 days. Christian chronology was fixed in the Julian calendar in the second century, and, with some slight alterations, continues in use in all Christian countries at the present day. You will find these matters very fully discussed in the leading Biblical encyclopedias.

S. L. F., Tacoma, Wash. Please explain II Sam. 13 : 37–39.

Jamieson says on this passage: "'The soul of King David longed to go forth unto Absalom' is not literally meant, for David certainly did not desire to visit his exiled son. The clause should be rendered, 'The anger of King David ceased to go forth against Absalom.' In this sense the verb is used II Sam. 11 : 1 and Gen. 14 : 18."

G. T. S., Benton, Pa. As far as has been discovered, the tablets relating to Nebuchadnezzar contain no reference to the episode of the three Hebrews, Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego.

H. W., Cleveland, Ohio. It is not a time for discussion or dissension. "A house divided against itself cannot stand."

A. H. P., Pittsburg, Pa., writes: "In a recent issue you say, 'We do not know of any good reason for assuming that we are responsible for what we do or think in sleep.' In my own experience, I have found that dreams give me a much closer insight of the real 'inwardness' of myself than I can measure in my waking moments. Traits of character which I had supposed were entirely obliterated from my life I have found, by dreams that placed me in circumstances where they had a chance to be tried, that what I supposed had been conquered long before was still there. Such dreams serve to keep me humble before God, and to know that it is only by his grace that I am what I appear to be."

B. M., Milton, Pa. The exemption under the selective draft because of religious belief is confined to the members of the Shaker, Quaker and Mennonite Churches, and only to such as were members of such denominations before June, 1917.

Farmer's Wife, Deckerville, Mich. 1. The ultimate fate of Ananias and Sapphira has been the subject of much earnest discussion. Until the last day reveals all that now is hidden, we cannot, of course, speak with any degree of certainty about it. 2. A truly saved person cannot get entirely away from God. Sooner or later he will find his way back to the fold. Christ has said of these: "No man is able to pluck them out of the Father's hand" (John 10 : 29).

A. L. R., Intervale, N. H. 1. We cannot reprint sermons once appearing in the Christian Herald. 2. No man is required by New Testament teachings to fast; to do so is no part of religious duty. What Christ urges is simply this: If you must fast, do so as to the Lord, and do not make a show of it. For thanksgiving there is, however, always a necessity. We have ever cause to be grateful to God for his manifold and constant good will, and it is but meet that, as a nation or state, we appoint a day separate to be devoted to that purpose.

R. H., New York. One prominent New York daily has urged the submission of the continuance of this war to the vote of the various peoples involved. Whether or not such a course is practical, and what the result of a vote would be, are matters of speculation.

D. O., Sr., Amaville, Texas. Please explain I Tim. 6 : 10.

The Greek for "root" has no article, hence the better translation, "a root" instead of "the root." The thought implied is not that the love of money is the one source of evil, but that out of it, as out of other vices of character, every form of evil would naturally spring. The pamphlet on the subject, which you submit, is very good reading.

Mrs. C., Montgomery, Ala. 1. The subject you mention is not a topic that need be discussed in the Mail-Bag. 2. What you say about an interest in and care for all dumb animals meets with our approval.

H. M. T., Argyle, N. Y. 1. The Red Cross must have paid workers, and we should not criticize that. Many of the big men of the country are giving their services, as are hundreds and hundreds of good devoted women, but as in every enterprise, some workers must be paid. 2. God could have visited upon Nebuchadnezzar the recoiling judgment which slew the men who had cast Daniel's friends into the oven, but he had other plans for the king, and therefore still spared him.

I. S., Short Beach, Conn. The use of tobacco in any form is to be discouraged, but we cannot agree with those who hold that its use is as harmful as the use of liquor.

R. S., Bordentown, N. J. The whole question of amusements must be relegated to the individual conscience. "To him that thinketh it is sin, it is sin." There are some men whose idea of duty is so rigid that they consider any amusement a sinful waste of time. There are others, however, who find in relaxation a means of increasing their power for labor. They wisely take relaxation in some form. Certain games have, by association with gambling, become disreputable. Discrimination is necessary here. There is talk of installing billiard tables for the use of the soldier boys. If young men need amusement for their leisure, it is surely well for us to see to it that they get such as is clean and unobjectionable.

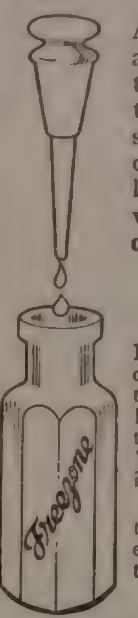
W. A. R. The meaning of Hab. 2 : 2 is perfectly plain. "That he may run that readeth it" may be commonly explained "so intelligible as to be easily read by any one, even by one running fast." The true sense is "so legible that whoever readeth it may run to tell all whom he can the good news of the foes coming down and of Judah's deliverance." "Run" is equivalent to announce the divine revelation, as every one who becomes informed of a divine message is bound to run, that is, use all dispatch, to make it known to others.

C. F., Richmond, Ind. We cannot tell with certainty what your experience means, but you may rest assured that one in touch with his Maker and Saviour is never wrong. The Lord, who "has searched us and known us, and knows our downsitting and uprising" (Ps. 139 : 1, 2), and watches over our steps, knows full well what to send us in the line of experience. While we are not to believe in individual unearthly manifestations, we are to feel the Presence ever near to us (Ps. 139 : 7).

Mrs. H. B. McK., Plattsburg, Miss. Please define "grace."

In theology, the word "grace" has been the hinge of three great historical controversies, and it is still a subject of varied interpretation. In the spiritual sense, it is divine favor or condescension to mankind, individually or collectively. In the concrete Gospel sense, it is the unmerited love and favor of God in Christ, as shown in the salvation freely provided for mankind (see Eph. 2 : 9). It may also be described as the divine influence acting within the heart, regenerating, sanctifying and keeping it. Grace brings the peace and joy of assurance. It is "the life of the soul, as the soul is the life of the body."

Lift Corns out with Fingers



A few drops of Freezone applied directly upon a tender, aching corn stops the soreness at once and soon the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off with the fingers without even a twinge of pain.
Freezone
Removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Does not irritate or inflame the surrounding skin or tissue. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.
Women! Keep a small bottle of Freezone on your dresser and never let a corn ache twice.
Small bottles can be had at any drug store in the U. S. or Canada

Keeps Skin Smooth, Firm, Fresh Youthful Looking

To dispel the tell-tale lines of age, illness or worry — to overcome flabbiness and improve facial contour — there is nothing quite so good as plain
Powdered SAXOLITE
Effective for wrinkles, crow's-feet, enlarged pores, etc., because it "tightens" and tones the skin and underlying tissue. No harm to tenderest skin. Get an ounce package, follow the simple directions — see what just one application will do. Sold at all drug stores.

Spotless woodwork
Perhaps you can get a hint from this woman's experience. "I keep my white kitchen woodwork sweet and clean with Gold Dust. I used to rub soap on a cloth and apply it, but found it left a smirch. I use Gold Dust because it is such a gentle grease-dissolvent. A tablespoonful to a pail of water removes, almost without rubbing, the oily film which will settle in a kitchen."

Young People's Topics for November 18

This Is the Day of All Days

Epworth League Topic, II Cor. 5 : 20 to 6 : 3, 17, 18

"BEHOLD, now is the day of salvation." Humanity is gifted with the art of delay. Always tomorrow glistens just beyond the horizon with a promised radiance which dulls our appreciation of today, and lulls us into a dangerous spirit of indecision. We say there is time enough yet, and we go on in our mediocre way, living on half rations in spiritual things, accomplishing half or less than half of what we might accomplish, counting little when our lives might be determinative. Yet today is the day of salvation. Yield your hearts and lives wholly to Him today and he will fill your tomorrows with successful service. Put him off today and you are assured of a tomorrow of bitter regret. "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters."

For What Am I Grateful?

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Ps. 34 : 1–22 (Thanksgiving Meeting)

THE psalm chosen for this topic is the testimony of a man whose soul God had saved. The mouth of the saved man is filled with praise, because his heart is filled with joy, and his soul is satisfied. If we are saved through the love of Christ we have in that a sufficient cause for unlimited gratitude, and we need not go farther for something to be grateful for; but there are many things which are ours through his favor and which are better because of his love. Having loved us and saved us, he gives us opportunities for service, and for these we should be grateful, because they make it possible for us to apprehend his spirit as we serve in his name.

The friendship of our fellow is sweeter in the light of His friendship. Our family relations are dearer because of the Elder Brother, and business opportunties are brighter because the success to which they lead may minister to the extension of his kingdom. Even sorrow may be a blessing because of the comfort of his presence. And we may be grateful for temptation because it demonstrates the power of his strength to make us strong. If Christ is ours and we are his we can be grateful for life and for all it has and all it promises. If our feet still tread the tangled paths of unforgiven sin, we may be grateful that we have such a Saviour ready to set us in the way of life. For "the Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants; and none of them that trust in him shall be desolate."

(This subject has been chosen as the Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, November 25, and therefore will not be repeated next week).

Our Denominational Foreign Mission Boards—Their History and Achievements

Christian Endeavor Topic. Isa. 55

THE history of the great foreign mission boards of the churches in America is the history of an epoch. Born of prayer and forged of the petitions of saints upon their knees, the boards have grown from small beginnings until they represent the greatest enterprise of modern Christendom. It would be impossible in this space to give even the minor details of the history of the several boards. Leaders chosen for this meeting should get in touch atonce with the secretaries of their own denominational boards, who will furnish material.

Second Bible Picture Study

AS announced in a previous issue of the Christian Herald, the lists of verses submitted by participants for the Second Bible Picture Study are now in the hands of the judges. The exceedingly large number of different answers submitted by those who took part has made the task of the judges a very hard one. Nevertheless, we anticipate their selection of the best verses in a short time.

The Four Greatest Events of Your Life

Overland
TRADE MARK REG.

Like the other great events of life, buying the family car is very much the concern of the wife and mother.

Happy that woman—and her name is legion—who by helpful suggestion persuades her provider against too small a car or by loving restraint checks an over-generous husband who would otherwise make the mistake of too large a car.

It is the woman of the family that suffers most the fatigue and inconvenience of too small a car—her's the self denial if too great an expense is shouldered in operating too large a car.

The thirty-five horsepower Overland Model Eighty-Five Four is roomy enough to be perfectly comfortable—to ward off fatigue on those long trips which should be of such healthful benefit to the whole family.

It has big, comfortable seats and cantilever rear springs that make it easy riding.

Yet it is not too large to be economical of operation.

And in the building of this beautiful Overland there is no hint of experiment, no construction extravagance.

For years it has outsold all other cars of such comfortable size, and produced in larger quantities, it is more inexpensively produced and sold at a lower price than would otherwise buy such comfort, style, reliability and quality.

Its purchase is dictated by common sense and the practice of true economy—it will be a great event in your life. See the Willys-Overland dealer about it now.

Reflections After the Skidding Accident

Reflections that show Tire Chains as the only real dependable device for the prevention of skidding, do not come to some motorists until their bare rubber tires skid and carry them upon the rocks of disaster.

How strange it is that some men are never guided by the experience of others.

They read the newspaper accounts of disastrous skidding accidents caused by lack of Tire Chains, but they do not heed the warning. They wait until the skidding of their own bare rubber tires results in death, injury or car-damage before they realize that tires are safe on wet-slippery-skiddy roads only when encased in Tire Chains.

Weed Tire Chains for Pneumatic Tires

The world's largest automobile insurers, after long and vast experience in handling automobile accident claims, strongly advise the use of Tire Chains on every automobile they insure. The Aetna Life Insurance Company, The Aetna Casualty and Surety Company and The Automobile Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn., now print on their automobile policies the vital information that Tire Chains are the only real dependable device for the prevention of skidding. Could anyone imagine a stronger endorsement?

Bible Lands in the Great War

Arabia Breaks With Turkey and Joins the Allies—The New King of Hejaz—The War Nearing Palestine

WHILE the great war continues on its destructive way in Europe, there are many whose eyes turn inquiringly toward the Bible lands. Believing that we are living in an age of prophetic fulfilment, they look forward to developments in the Near and Middle East, which in the minds of Bible readers may transcend all others in importance. Will the Moslem grasp be loosened from the holy places at last, and will the forces of Christendom succeed in accomplishing that which all the long line of Crusades failed to bring to pass? Palestine is an historic battleground. The City of David has witnessed many sieges, and the mountains and valleys, north and south from Jerusalem to the sea, have all been sanctified by suffering. Who can tell whether the great struggle of Armageddon may not be rapidly approaching?

For centuries the Christians in the West shed their blood and spent their treasure in repeated efforts to take possession of the city of Jerusalem from the west. They failed. Will the Allies, having failed to force the Dardanelles, now attempt a flanking movement at Jerusalem and the Levant from the south and east?

Emir Faical the Governor of the new Arabia

LET us look at the situation. The British in the south have met with success. An attempted invasion of Egypt by the Turks and the damming of the Suez Canal by sandbags proved a delusion. Allied troops are now reported as being only a little distance from the outskirts of Gaza in Southern Palestine. The Allies are reported as having at least 100,000 men in training on the island of Cyprus, including Syrian refugees, Greeks, Armenians and various other nationalities. There are not more than 1,500 Turkish soldiers, and few, if any, German troops in Palestine. The one obstacle in the way of such a movement from Cyprus would be the ubiquitous U-boats.

The Russian campaign in Turkish Armenia, undertaken by Grand Duke Nicholas after the brilliant capture of Erzerum, Trebizond, and other cities, has been brought to a halt by the Rusisan political crisis and the consequent military stagnation. The Russians, however, have maintained their gains in Asia in some measure. It is by no means improbable that they may be able to reach the warm waters of the Mediterranean, and join hands with their Allies at the gulf of Alexandretta.

Recently it was reported from Petrograd that the Russians—Mar Shimun's Syrian detachments—had reached Chal on the River Zab, an eastern tributary of the Tigris, within sixty miles of Mosul and not far from Arbela, where Alexander the Great met and crushed the Persians. English forces operating in Mesopotamia are within striking distance of Mosul, the largest city in that part of Turkey. In the capture of Bagdad, the southern parts of Persia and lower Mesopotamia were tranquilized. With the possession of Mosul (near the site of ancient Nineveh), the way would probably be open to join the Allied forces in the north and northeast. With the Arabs in the south and southeast hard on the march to Jerusalem, there to join with the Syrian forces, a complete union could be effected which might result in mighty changes involving not only a large part of Arabia but Jerusalem itself, the holy places throughout Palestine, and even as far to the eastward as to include the traditional site of Eden.

The flag and color guard of the new kingdom of Arabia

© Pictorial Press

ONE of the first evidences of the new Orient which is emerging out of the war is the establishment of an independent kingdom in the former vilayet or province of Hejaz in Arabia. Hejaz is the most important of the eight political divisions into which Arabia is divided, by reason of its possession of Mecca and Medina, the "holy places" of Islam; and it is El Hussein Ibn Ali, the Grand Shereef or Emir of Mecca and hereditary Keeper of the Holy Places, who has become king of Hejaz, after leading a successful revolt against Turkey and declaring his independence. The Grand Shereef of Mecca has always wielded great influence in the Moslem world, and his decision to take the side of the Allies in the present conflict has had a very important effect throughout the East.

Early in the war it became evident that both groups of belligerents realized the value of Mohammedan support. Germany was successful in bringing Turkey into the war as one of her allies, and one of the first moves was to get the Sultan, as Caliph and Commander of the Faithful, to declare a holy war against the "infidels," the term in the present case being applied to the British and French, who were pictured as the oppressors of Mohammedan peoples in Asia and Africa. As a result, there were risings in India and elsewhere. Then the Allies counter-attacked and took both military and diplomatic measures in various directions to break up what Lloyd George called "the ramshackle Turkish Empire." The Mesopotamian campaign was part of this plan; but even more interesting was the scheme to sever the bond between the rule of the Sultan and the religious influence which radiated from the holy places of Arabia.

THE Arabs were never fond of their Turkish rulers, whose administration was neither very efficient nor very just. Ottoman control in Hejaz was largely maintained by the payment of an annual subsidy to the Keeper of the Holy Places. When, therefore, British diplomatic agents, on behalf of their government, guaranteed the protection of the Holy Places, El Hussein Ibn Ali, as well as the Emirs and Imams who recognized his commanding position, decided to throw off their allegiance to Constantinople.

At the end of May, 1916, the revolt began, and the following month El Hussein Ibn Ali published his declaration of independence. This extremely interesting document accused the Turkish government of blasphemy and impiety since it had come under the control of the Committee of Union and Progress—the Young Turk organization led by Djemal Pasha, Enver Pasha, and Tallaat Bey. Furthermore, the proclamation declared, the Turks had been guilty of maladministration and the most brutal oppression, robbing and murdering respectable citizens, and causing so much suffering that even the well-to-do classes had been reduced to the verge of destitution.

The Arabian revolt succeeded so thoroughly that the Turks were driven out of Hejaz and forced a considerable distance north. The Turkish garrisons at Mecca, at the Red Sea ports, and at Taif, were captured. For more than a year following these successes, the Arabs, provided with funds and military equipment by the British and French governments, continued to execute a carefully thought-out plan of operation. Part of the strategic railroad north of Medina was destroyed and many Turkish posts were captured. A British official report issued in August of this year said that the campaign was proceeding very favorably, while subsequent information showed that the Arabs had reached Maan, about seventy miles northeast of Akaba, at the head of the Gulf of Akaba, on the easterly side of the Sinai Peninsula, and that a junction was being effected with the British army in Southern Palestine. Since the Turks in the province of Yemen have been driven into a corner and surrounded, it may now be said that the whole of Arabia has passed from Turkish control as a result of the war, although in some regions before the war the Arabs had already taken matters into their own hands.

THE new kingdom, it should be understood, does not embrace all of Arabia, which has an area of about one million square miles, but only Hejaz, the size of which is between 90,000 and 100,000 square miles. But Hejaz is the most important region, both on account of its possession of the holy places, and the fact that a greater proportion of the country is fertile. Most of Arabia's million square miles consists of uninhabitable desert, but there is plenty of good land which only needs a more settled condition of affairs for the creation of thriving and prosperous communities.

Practically the whole of the Persian Gulf littoral, all of Mesopotamia as far as north of Bagdad, the Red Sea coast of Arabia and the Sinai Peninsula, representing a huge area of the Mohammedan world, have been detached from the influence of the Sultan of Turkey, as the recoil of the plan to swing the weight of Islam against the Allies. The establishment of the kingdom of Hejaz is the first definite political change which marks this great reversal of fortune in the drama of world conflict on the Eastern stage.

IN Mesopotamia, Arabia, and all the Eastern lands, military operations are usually dependent on the condition of the weather. The dry season is the one chosen for going to war. As late as a month ago, it was reported that the king of the Hejaz was planning military operations on an extensive scale in conjunction with the Allies. The object seems to be for concerted action between four forces; the Russian troops and the British force under General Maude, which could effect a junction near or south of Mosul and thence proceed southeastward toward northern Palestine; the other junction being that of the Hejaz Arabs coming up from the southeast and a British force from the east, meeting in the vicinity of Gaza. It has been said that Arab forces have penetrated northward as far as Mount Seir, in Edom. Meanwhile, it is learned that trenches have been dug near Jerusalem, and preparations made by the Turks, under German military advisers, for the expected invasion. What may be in store for the holy places, which have become sacred not only to the Christians of the world but to almost all religionists, can only be conjectured.

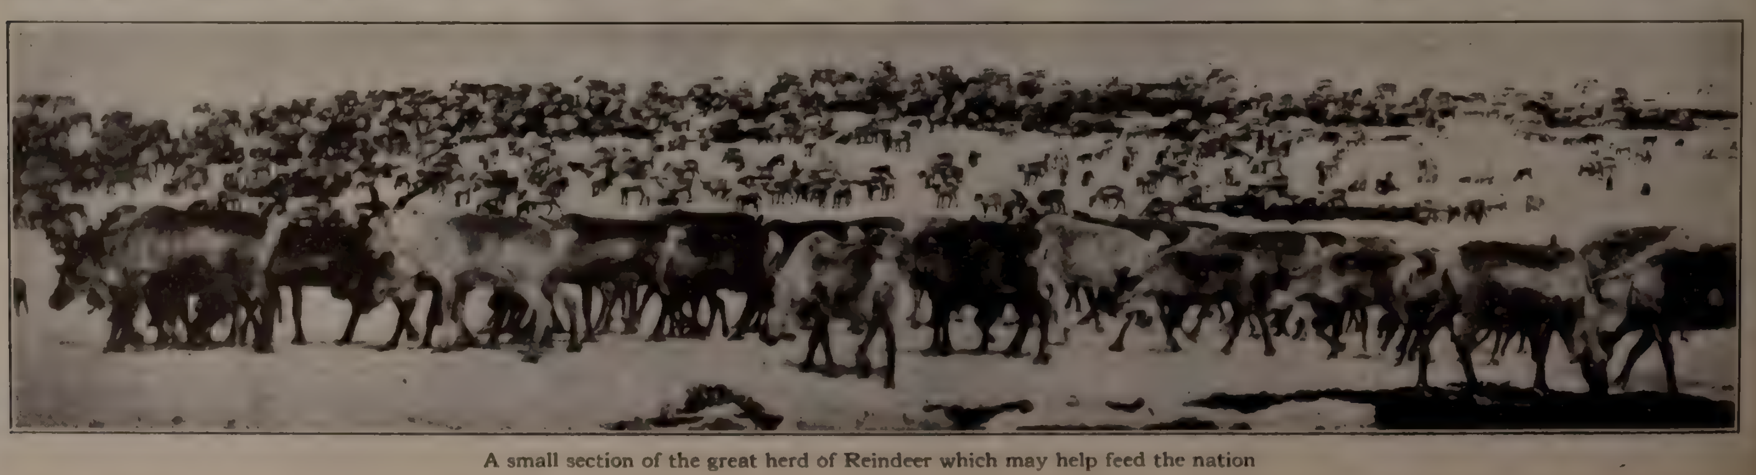
Reindeer Beef from Alaska

IT came out of the great Northland the other day—just a brief two-line telegraphic dispatch from the semi-Arctic region of far Alaska. This was what the wire read: "Reindeer herders are arranging to ship thousands of carcasses to help relieve the meat shortage in the United States and Allied countries."

There, far away in the almost unknown Northland, thought of by most of us as nothing but bleak and hostile territory, Uncle Sam has been gradually gathering, by infinite pains and careful tutoring of the primitive people, a vast herd of animals, the Alaskan reindeer. Today, with all the world at war and many nations loudly clamoring for food, he has at his command a gathering of horns and hoofs and heads that number full a hundred thousand animals. And now from this vast gathering come the first carcasses to feed the people of the United States and perhaps be shipped to Allied countries. The average full-grown beast will dress at a very low average 500 pounds. So Uncle Sam stands in command of an army of beef weighing at least 37,000,000 pounds.

"The Alaska Reindeer Service" was begun in 1892, when, at the instance of Dr. Sheldon Jackson, the United States Congress issued a grant of $204,500 to purchase Siberian reindeer for shipment to Alaska. From then until 1902 no less than 3,000 animals were imported.

The reindeer is a threefold utility. It supplies splendid meat, rich milk and valuable hide. The last named is as valuable as buckskin, and brings about $5 a pound. Francis J. Dickie.



A small section of the great herd of Reindeer which may help feed the nation

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Helping Our Ally. In order to give Italy the fullest possible measure of support in her resistance to the German drive across her frontiers, the government at Washington on October 31 removed all export restrictions on material of every kind intended for Italy. Strenuous efforts were made to assemble immediately the 100,000 tons of shipping needed to carry the material overseas. The United States government also placed $230,000,000 to Italy's credit.

Plots Against Brazil. The State Department in Washington on October 30 made public two more Luxburg dispatches which showed the German minister to Argentina in the rôle of plotter against the sovereignty of Brazil. In one dispatch sent August 4, 1917, he was quoted as stating "I am convinced that we shall be able to carry through our principal political aims in South America, the maintenance of an open market in Argentina and the reorganization of South Brazil." Heavily censored dispatches from Rio Janeiro on October 31 indicated that there was serious trouble among the German colonists of South Brazil, and that Brazil was mobilizing an army in that region.

More Speed on Ships. A conference on October 31 at Washington between builders, labor leaders and officials of government departments arranged for speeding up the shipbuilding contracts. It was announced that the principal obstacle to the rapid building of ships was the shortage of labor, and the suggestion was being seriously considered to exempt ship-workers from the operation of the selective draft law. Chairman Hurley of the Shipping Board announced that in the whole of 1916 American yards had turned out a little over 750,000 tons, and that in the next four months over 1,000,000 tons of ships would be launched by American shipyards.

May Block Railroads. It was announced on October 30 and 31 that the Switchmen's Union of North America would demand a fifty per cent. wage increase on every railroad in the country and that the conductors and trainmen might possibly demand an increase of twenty to fifty per cent. from nineteen railroads centering in Chicago. The men declared that the advances were necessary in view of the increased cost of living. If these powerful unions find it necessary to strike in order to maintain wages at a living scale, it may completely tie up the railroad system of the country and seriously embarrass the war activities of the government.

President Aids Armenians. President Wilson on October 29 issued an appeal to the American people for contributions in aid of the 400,000 orphans and 2,000,000 destitute survivors of the Armenian and Syrian peoples suffering from exposure and starvation in Western Asia. The Christian Herald through its fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of the war has already given over $55,000 for relief work in this field through the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee, and will gladly forward any contributions which its subscribers may desire to send.

Reviving the Kuklux. Herbert S. Bigelow, head of the People's Church of Cincinnati, Socialist and pacifist, and one of the leaders of the People's Council, who was accused of having prayed for the Kaiser, was seized by masked men on the night of October 28 at Newport, Ky., and taken into the woods and horsewhipped, the men declaring that they were acting "in the name of the poor women and children of Belgium." The victim was then left to make his way out of the woods as best he could. Mr. Bigelow was taken to a hospital in a serious condition. Secretary of War Baker, a friend of the outraged minister referring to the case, declared: "The right of free speech is guaranteed by our Constitution, and abuses of that right are punished by law. No night riders are needed, and when the country is at war for liberty and justice, they make a humiliating contrast to our national ideals and aims."

Transport Torpedoed. The American transport Finland, 12,000 tons, formerly of the Red Star Line, was torpedoed while convoyed on her return trip. The damage was slight and she returned to a French port under her own steam. Neither the submarine nor the torpedo was seen. Three of the naval gun crew four of the ships crew and two soldiers were killed.

The Lost Commission

UNDER the above title Rev. Dr. David J. Burrell of the Marble Collegiate Church of New York City in next week's sermon performs the duty of the watchman upon the tower calling upon the churches to awake and receive again the great charge of the Master..

Katherine Breshkovsky, the little grandmother of the Russian Revolution, has become a world figure since the scepter slipped from the hand of Czar Nicholas. Busy as she is in helping to reconstruct a nation upon the foundation of revolutionary Russia, she took time to tell her story to Maynard Owen Williams, and in next week's Christian Herald he tells it to you.

Next week also Dr. Gray tells us about Babylon, her coming restoration and her fall.

It is a pretty hard headache that lasts a week, but it was necessary to hold Dr. Vail's article on "How to Avoid Headaches" until next week. Relief is in sight!

Norway Protests. Copenhagen dispatches of November 1 stated that Norway had presented a note to Germany regarding the attack by German cruisers on a convoy of Norwegian and other steamships in the North Sea last month. The note called the attention of the German government to previous protests of Norway, declared that Norwegian vessels were forced to accept the protection of a convoy because of the illegal attacks of Germany's navy, and declared also that the recent attack had made a profound impression upon the Norwegian people.

Fire Destroys Munitions. Fire on the piers of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at Locust Point, Baltimore harbor, on October 30 and 31 destroyed munitions and grain for General Pershing's army and for our Allies, to a value in excess of $1,000,000, destroying property of about the same value. The fire was reported to have been of an incendiary origin. Following a similar fire in Brooklyn, orders were issued to place double guards over all food depots, piers and warehouses. Following the Baltimore fire, even stricter orders were issued, and permits to enemy aliens allowing them to work or reside within half a mile of the water-fronts in the principal Eastern cities were revoked.

Bolsheviki Loses. Municipal elections held throughout Russia on November 1 resulted in sweeping victories of the non-partisan and Conservative Socialist groups over the radical Bolsheviki candidates. The radical vote ranged from two to seven per cent.

The American Red Cross announced on November 1 that it had purchased a million pounds of condensed milk to be sent to Russia for the babies of that country, the cans to be labeled "From free America to free Russia."

Fragments of News. It was announced on October 30 that as a result of co-operation between national, state and municipal authorities an agreement had been reached by the food distributors in the New York districts under which the distributors bound themselves to do business at the same rate of profit as before the war. As November 1 approached, the date on which the food law restrictions took effect, there was a notable drop in prices of many lines throughout the East. It was announced on October 31 that more than 100,000 manufacturers, wholesalers and distributors of foods would be under license on November 1. Licensed dealers, it was also announced, would not be permitted to supply any person with goods in excess of his reasonable requirements for sixty days. . . . Copenhagen dispatches of October 29 reported that the Danish food council had arranged for the slaughtering of 300,000 swine, the meat from which would be reserved for the town populations, that farmers would be permitted to slaughter swine for their own uses, and that the meat from other swine, which it might be necessary to kill, would be exported. . . . The "Great White Way," otherwise known as Broadway, New York City, may be dimmed by the cutting off of its flaring lights and its multiplied electric signs in order to save the coal represented by the electricity consumed by the signs. . . . The American Red Cross Commission in France reported on October 29 that it would need a total of $40,000,000, of which $10,000,000 was already appropriated, to cover the necessities of its work in France for the six months ending April 30. The Red Cross War Council has appropriated over $30,000 to buy 75 tons of food for American prisoners in Germany. The food is to be forwarded through Berne, Switzerland. . . . The Federal Trade Commission on October 30 made available to American citizens all the German-owned patents and copyrights filed in the Patent Office in Washington. The order affected in the neighborhood of 20,000 articles, many of them drugs necessary to the proper treatment of the diseases and wounds incident to army life. Licenses to use these patents will be issued only where the public interest demands it, where the manufacturer gives evidences of his ability to manufacture the article, and where there is a demand not now being met. Owners of the patents must be reimbursed for the use of their inventions after the war. . . Four months of rain in Natal, South Africa, culminated on Saturday and Sunday, October 27 and 28, in a rainfall of more than eight inches in twenty-four hours. The streams, already swollen, swept in floods across the lowlands, and it was reported that over 1,000 natives had been drowned. . . . The Dodge Brothers on October 31 secured an order from the United States Circuit Court in Detroit requiring the Ford Motor Company to disperse its undivided profits, which were stated to total $60,000,000. . . . Washington and the District of Columbia became "dry" on November 1, through the operation of the Sheppard law. . . . Great Britain on October 31 released merchandise of German and Austrian manufacture held in Rotterdam, but purchased by American companies, and paid for before the entrance of the United States into the war on April 6, 1917. . . . It is announced that an arrangement will soon be perfected through which American steel will be exchanged for Japanese ships.

Transforming the Auto Shops. At a conference in Washington on November 2 between representatives of the automobile manufacturing interests and representatives of the government, the foundation was laid for the diversion of almost the entire automobile industry to the uses of the government for war purposes. It was announced that the output of pleasure cars would be reduced about seventy-five per cent. and that the factories and their skilled workers would be turned to the manufacture of airplane engines and parts and to munitions. It was suggested that possibly 200,000 skilled workers, of the million employed, might be transformed to the shipyards.

For the Fight in the Air. It was announced from Washington on November 2 that the first fighting airplane made wholly in America of American materials had passed a successful test in the air, and that few changes would need to be made, either in the design of the plane or of the Liberty motor. The American building program will be expanded to meet all the needs of the Allies.

Fixing Shipworkers' Wages. The United States Shipbuilding Labor Adjustment Board established, on November 3, a new scale of wages for the shipyards of the Pacific coast. The scale increased the former rates from 10% to 30% and was to be a minimum rate. The unions, not satisfied, will appeal to the President.

The scene of the latest great battle of the world war. Black line, battle line before Austro-German attack. Dotted line, approximate battle line on November 1

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE event of the past week, ending November 3, has been the offensive against Italy by the Germans and Austrians, the opening of which was noted in last week's issue.

The offensive started on October 23 on that portion of the Isonzo line which extends between Plezzo and Tolmino. In the middle of this position is the Monte Nero, 7,367 feet high, which was held by the Italians. To the west of this line, across the Italian border, are located Monte Maggiore, and further to the southeast Monte Matajur, the two crowning summits of the range of mountains which intervenes between the Flitsch-Tolmino line and the comparatively level plain of the Italian province of Venetia.

THE Austro-German offensive had apparently, from what we know now, been in course of preparation for a good six months before it was launched, and when it was launched it moved in two directions. One column thrust directly west between Flitsch and Tolmino, and the other drove south parallel with the Isonzo River. Both attacks were delivered without artillery preparation, contrary to custom, in the early morning hours of October 23, when the landscape was bathed in mist, and both succeeded. The first column poured through the passes on both sides of Monte Nero, isolating the Italians on that mountain, and captured Saga and Caporetto; then without a moment's halt drove farther west, and before night had driven the Italians from the crowning ridge of the mountain chain extending from Monte Maggiore to Monte Matajur, from whence their way to the plain to the east of Udine lay all the way down hill. The offensive to the south broke and drove through the Italian line forming the northern edge of the salient protruding eastward on the Bainsizza plateau, continued its course southward, and broke through the Italian line, on the southern edge of the plateau.

On Sunday and Monday the advance proceeded as outlined last week. On Tuesday the northern half also swung to the westward and entered Cividale at the head of the railway leading northeastward from Udine.

A couple of days later Gemona Tricesone, and Udine itself, which had been the headquarters of the Italian commander in chief, General Cadorna, were entered by the Austro-Germans.

During this time the Italian line running south on the Carso plateau, to Duino on the Adriatic, had held firm, but now being tremendously outflanked, it had no resource but to retreat. This retreat was begun early on the morning of Monday, October 29th, and was at first conducted in an orderly fashion, but the Austro-Germans striking south from San Giovanni di Manzano harassed the Italian retreat, breaking it up somewhat.

TURNING now to the northern front, the Carnic, as soon as matters developed to the point described above, a movement great in force directly south by the Austrian forces began, and moved progressively to the west, the most easterly point of departure of this northern offensive being Tarvis, from whence a column moved southward through the Bicliga pass. At the same time another Austrian column drove south along the railway from Pontafel and captured Pontecba while still further west a third Austrian column forced its way south from Mauthen through the Ploecken pass as far south as Paluzza. All of this was accomplished by Tuesday night. The total losses of the Italians were given by Berlin as 200,000 men and 1,800 guns.

To the west of Udine there run several rivers north and south, the most easterly of which is the Tagliamento. It is on the line of this river that General Cadorna is reported to have prepared to make his stand against the invaders. The next westerly line of defense which need be considered is the river Piave. Both of these streams are torrential in character, bordered by marshes and usually easily fordable.

Going still farther west, but involving in case of its use as a line of defense the abandonment of Venice, Padua, and Vicenza, is the river Adige, a broad, deep stream which is better adapted for a successful stand.

A glance at the excellent map on this page will show that the headwaters of both the Tagliamento and the Piave are to the east of the western end of the Austro-Italian frontier. From this it results that any position assumed by the Italian army along the line of either of these rivers can be outflanked by an offensive launched to the south from the Austrian frontier.

As this issue of the Christian Herald went to press artillery duels and patrol engagements had already begun in the Tagliamento line. Heavy British and French reinforcements had reached the Italians and an attempt at an outflanking movement from the Trentino was reported from Rome to have been repulsed. Premier Lloyd George of England and Premier Painleve of France left Paris for Rome on November 4 with large staffs of military experts.

EVENTS on the other fronts in Europe during the week were generally of a routine character. On the western front the British made a slight advance in the northeastern sector of the Ypres salient, and the Germans retired from hill positions on the Chemin des Dames s uth of Laon.

The submarine sinkings show a slight decrease.

IN southern Palestine the British have captured the historic city of Beersheba, about forty miles south of Jerusalem and about twenty-eight miles to the east of Gaza which they were reported as attacking on Nov. 4.

British destroyers in a brush with German forces in the straits between Denmark and Norway, on Nov. 3, sank a German auxiliary cruiser and ten armed patrol craft.

The Russian front has been quiet all the week. On the first of November Premier Kerensky made statements of the gravest import in a formal interview. Kerensky is quoted as saying that while the Russian republic would continue as a faithful member of the Entente, it would be necessary for her Allies to now take up the heaviest part of the burden. The premier pointed out that the great needs of Russia at the present time were supplies of all kinds, and particularly of money. The American government responded with an immediate new credit of $31,700,000.

Washington announced on Nov. 5 that American troops on the front line in their first action had repelled a German raid, losing three men killed, five men wounded, and twelve captured.

The Abiding Value of Luther's Work

By O. H. PANNKOKE, Executive Secretary of the New York Quadricentenary Committee

DR. SCHAFF in 1892 wrote of Luther: "His influence extends far beyond the limits of his native land. He belongs to the church and to the world." At the four hundredth anniversary of his birth (1883) the universal interest in every part of the civilized world proved this. The greater test came, however, during the past year, the four hundredth anniversary of the posting of the ninety-five theses. The difficulty of rousing interest in bygone events amid the cataclysm of the hour was obvious. The hesitancy to spend time on the discussion of a man who, among other things, also was the greatest German, seemed natural. Neither fact was able to curtail general participation or popular response.

Comment is frequently made on the popular striking personality of Luther, and that is adduced as the reason for the abiding interest in him. There is some truth in this. Luther appeals to the imagination in his personal traits as well as in the fearless swiftness of his action. Esaias Tegner, the Swedish national poet, in his famous address on Luther a century ago, brought out that side of Luther in bold relief. Similarly did it appeal to that lover of iconoclasts, Thomas Carlyle, who compared Luther to the rugged granite cliffs in whose hollows green pastures afford home sites for men and food for beasts.

But popularity without substantial achievements is momentary. The four hundredth Reformation anniversary celebration did not celebrate a man. It celebrated ideals and principles that today are still at the basis of true religion and free government.

Luther fought his way through the formal practices and outward rites of the old church to the conviction that religion is personal, the intimate relation of the child of God to his heavenly Father. That thought he expressed in the theses, stating that when our Lord Jesus says "Repent ye," he means a change of the heart and a new life. More beautifully and at length he expressed this in the Reformation tract on the "Liberty of the Christian Man." "Through Christ we are free men and lords of all things, taken into the very bosom of God."

THIS proposition of Luther, which has become the veriest commonplace of religious conviction, meant a changed world order. Medieval religious life centered around church officials as the representatives of God on earth and the sole means of approach to God. The early tradition of Peter, as the leader among the apostles, had grown in the ambitious successors of Peter until they became the rulers of church and state. They claimed the right of interpreting and teaching God's Word. Through the sacraments, especially the mass, they claimed every opportunity of reconciliation with God. Within the church was salvation. The church officials were the church.

Many people see in the medieval church nothing more than a mistaken idea. No idea without organization will long continue. The strength of the medieval church lay in its organization, more compact than the Roman Empire, held together by the haunting fear of eternal damnation.

Luther's claim of personal union with God crumpled with one mighty stroke that massive structure of medieval ecclesiastical organization. It made superfluous the churchmen by opening free access to God. We love Luther for teaching us that we can go directly and fearlessly to our Saviour. We love him more because he was the fighting man that broke the spiritual tyranny of the Middle Ages.

To the skeptic, changes in religious convictions have little significance. He likes to think of progress as going on independent of any religion or church influence. As a matter of fact, the despised Christianity of the first centuries conquered the Roman Empire and changed the civilization of the Mediterranean basin. The lightning of the monk of Wittenberg blazed the way for the modern day.

IN the conviction that religion is personal lay the necessity for opening the Bible and making it accessible to all. The Reformation gave the world the open Bible. Wherever the Reformation principles obtained the Bible became the property of the common man, the peasant in the country, the artisan or laboring man in the city. Some duller minds think of the open Bible only as the outward privilege of using the Bible over against Rome's prohibition of Bible reading. That would have been of little consequence. Luther changed men's hearts toward the Bible. Where the old church had insisted that the Bible was unintelligible to the common man—a book to be feared more than loved—Luther insisted that it was simple and sufficient to be read by all, to be loved by all. One reason of the great progress of Protestant nations in the past 400 years is the fact that the Bible became common property, not outwardly but inwardly.

It was obvious that men had to be educated to become at home in the Bible. Very shortly after the beginning of the Reformation, Luther published a platform on common education, which our National Commissioner of Education, Dr. Claxton, said in the past year, in many sections of the United States is still an ideal to be worked for. The basic reason which Luther gives is, of course, religious, and that too gave the great impulse to carry Luther's ideals into practice. Then, however, he told that children ought be educated though there were neither God nor soul nor heaven nor hell; for the most valuable property of a state is its educated citizens. As a result, in 1529 the first public school system in the history of the world was established in Saxony. Fifty years after the Reformation began more than 1,500 common schools had been established. The stimulus to mind-training made itself felt also in preparing the scientific advance of the past centuries.

Luther taught the dignity of honest labor. The fear of work was the curse of the closing Middle Ages. The Mendicant Friars and the hordes of religious and other beggars had become a common scourge. The church stood back of the evil and sanctioned it with the appearance of religious value. That notion the Reformation speedily destroyed. It substituted the Biblical thought that men must work if they would eat. It has been claimed that the Reformation taught Europe to work again.

THE great blessing of the Reformation, however, is that it brought the emancipation of man as man. It brought his spiritual emancipation, making all men equal before God. In its further development it brought the temporal emancipation, making all men equal with each other. After all, man in his opportunities and possibilities is the dynamic that brings progress. Build a wall about him and the world stands still. Free him, give him opportunity, throw open the possibilities of the world, and he will go out to conquer. The Reformation freed men, intellectually, socially, politically. The posting of Luther's theses was a declaration of independence.

Luther lived 400 years ago. The world was different then; how different no modern man can fully appreciate. The world was limited and small. Such little knowledge as there was was warped by curious superstitions and strange fancies.

Luther was a man of his day. His religious teachings, as they restate the Bible truths, are today the fundamental teachings of all evangelical Christians. In his notions on secular affairs he is often medieval, often only half modern. It would be strange if it were otherwise. Since Luther's day 400 years of unparalleled progress, activity and change have swept over the world. Today, the schoolboy knows more about economics than Adam Smith, and about politics than Grotius and Burlamaqui. They were the pioneers. So Luther was the pioneer. His was the greater task of blazing the trail. All later success was possible only through his initial daring and foresight. And in the light of later progress, his foresight becomes the more remarkable. After 400 years, mankind is still building on the foundation which he laid: personal union with God through Christ, common education, the conquest of the world through honest labor, the freedom of man with man in realizing the opportunities of his life.

The World After the War

A SERMON BY REV. WALTER EVERETT BURNETT[*]

TEXT—Matt. 16 : 3. "Can ye not discern the signs of the times?"

WHILE the earth is rocking beneath the shock of the vastest and intensest conflict of human history, some of us cannot refrain from thinking about the permanent effects of the terrific struggle upon the lives of the nations engaged, in realms of affairs other than military. The war shall have a decisive effect upon international politics; the famous balance of power whose rather uncertain equilibrium has yet served to maintain the measure of peace that Europe has enjoyed for several decades shall be shattered, and new alignments will control affairs for a period; but great as the effect of the war shall be in thus reshaping international political affairs, who can doubt that it shall be equally influential in reshaping the whole round of domestic affairs of the nations that are engaged? War has been one of the most powerful stimulants in the careers of nations. It has made new maps; but more important still, it has enlarged and charged with new energies the minds of great masses of mankind.

All of this shall not be less but more true of the war that is sweeping like a furious flame over the world today. It would be presumptuous to attempt to read in detail the page that has not been turned over for us by the Almighty; but it would be puerile to make no intelligent effort to read the plain signs of the times and anticipate what shall be some of the indirect but significant results of the war.

IT is not beyond the bounds of reason to expect that the war will bring to the world a revival of idealism. Does some one say "Why, this struggle signifies the bankruptcy of idealism"? "It is just that our vaunted progressing civilization has collapsed and carried the high hopes of the world's most aspiring spirits down with it." I think it would be nearer the truth to say that nothing has collapsed that was greatly worth the saving. If the ethical pillars upon which the fair temple of our security and prosperity were builded, crumbled beneath the weight, there was unsoundness in them, and we shall rebuild the structure upon storm- and fireproof columns.

There is something hidden deeply in the constitution of human nature that shows man at his best under the blows of adversity. Man's spirit feeds upon perils, hardships, sacrifices; these challenge its noblest energies. It is the essential spirituality of a human being that thus flames up under gales of misfortune and claims final invincible power over every brutal conspiracy against its highest well-being. To this inward splendor of the soul hardship is friendlier than ease. It can be stung into superhuman vigor by whips of pain; or it can be drugged into sodden torpor if life grows too ghastly smooth. I simply utter the great law and pass on.

THE political and economic effects of the war may be certainly foreseen, I take it. It will be a vastly more independent and alert type of manhood that shall come marching home after this big day's work is done. The truly liberal and progressive causes shall move ahead as if they had somehow gained a new mainspring. And that is exactly what shall have happened. This war is a magnified school of ethics. The trenches are a real university of political morals. For the phrases that have been repeated and reiterated are that this is a war for the people's rights; this is a struggle between autocracy and freedom. Very well then, of human rights and freedom these soldiers are thinking and talking. Can it be that after this stern course in the great school of war, where the lesson has been every day the same, namely, that the rights of the people are infinitely precious and worth any sacrifice to maintain, that these soldiers shall not come back to life in the homeland with a new-born appreciation of justice and freedom, much more quick to perceive the essential human justice that enters into the issues with which their own governments are dealing? This great slogan that the rights of the people must be safeguarded is a two-edged sword. Never will the masses of men be so quick as after the war to see that human rights have other foes than political autocracy.

AND the sense of personal power shall be heightened, and that will wind a powerful mainspring that shall uncoil with vast power in the nations' political and economic life. The fact is that most of the soldiers shall come back remade men. They have been taken out of their usual environments and thrust into another. They were clerks or shopworkers or farmers, as well as students or lawyers or doctors; and their vocation has numbed and hardened them. There are innumerable men and women who have been made almost mechanical by remaining at one task for ten or twenty years. Life has shaped itself into grooves for them, and they have lost power to react freshly or make new adjustments. Now, whether they desired or not, these men by the ten thousand have been lifted out of their environments which fitted them like a coat of mail, and thrust into a new world. They will be remade; that is not stating it too strongly. They will develop new powers of initiative, and all of their thinking and acting will be drenched with a new sense of personal worth and power.

THIS is the point at which to take notice of another condition, war-made, that will exert a lasting effect upon the political and economic and social affairs of these warring nations. Women have stepped forth from the twilight of privilege and responsibility into the full light of public life. It is unthinkable that they shall ever be content to shrink back into their former restricted freedom. They have drunk of the cup of self-maintenance a deeper draught than they had ever had, and now they must be reckoned with to a tenfold degree in the political and economic readjustments. Now woman is probably conservative, but her conservatism will be largely influenced by her instincts. Her conservatism will hardly be shaped by the political and social customs that have prevailed, because she has struggled against these to secure her new privileges; her conservatism will be most powerfully influenced by her instincts of tenderness and compassion, and this conservatism will therefore bring a large reinforcement to the radicalism which we may expect to see manifested in political and economic affairs. The essential spirit of this radicalism will simply be a finer sense and a higher estimate of human worth in contrast to the sacredness of traditional forms or of individual property rights.

But now let me pass to what shall interest us more deeply, if that be possible, namely, the probable effect of the war upon the Christian churches. It is folly to blind our eyes to the fact that the church as an institution has been none too thriving during the last several decades. Its growth has not kept pace with the increase of population. Out of one hundred million of population the Protestant churches claim 24 per cent., while the Catholic churches claim $14^{3}/_{5}$ per cent. That sixty per cent. of the total population is outside of the church is not encouraging at the outset.

BUT even more serious than this lack of vigor as revealed by statistics is the manifest aloofness of large portions of the population to the church, and the often expressed conviction that the church has lost its power of leadership to bring to pass the large program of the Kingdom of God. Now, I do not depreciate the inestimable value of the work that the church has done. It has been sufficiently true to the mission with which it was entrusted to open the wondrous door of the new life in Christ to many. But does this constitute the sole mission of the church? The mission of a physician is to heal individuals who are sick. Suppose then that the physicians of a city have been faithful in looking after the sick, and have healed hundreds of persons who were stricken with chills and fevers and injuries, would this represent the sum total of the responsibilities? Not at all; for in this list of diseases that they have cured I find typhoid fever and tuberculosis. These physicians then must develop the social sense; they must develop an interest in the sanitary conditions of the community; they must practice prevention no less than healing those who are now sick. Thus it is with the church. The church may save individuals, but if it is indifferent to these larger matters of social morality it has fulfilled but half of its function. Many are convinced that the church is lamentably failing in this large ministry. Let us consider some facts.

Despite all our preaching about the brotherhood of man, the war came. And now that we uncover the maze of diplomacy we find a tangle of dark and devious dealings between statesmen whose aim was to secure by one means or another advantages each for his own nation and its friends over their competitors. Intrigue and subtlety and secret alliances was the law; never was the appeal to open justice, to the rights of peoples as members of the great family of nations. Diplomacy was war, not frank, sincere counsel in the full light of intelligent public opinion. We are paying now the awful price of national selfishness. We are reaping the fruits of this disreputable game wherein the strong laid hold of what they could get while the weak were despoiled.

BUT another and still more damaging state of affairs calls for explanation. Christianity speaks with no clear voice seemingly now that the debacle is upon us. It seems to be quite largely fused with patriotism in these days. The Christian church in England upholds the English cause, the German churches vigorously uphold the German cause, the American churches uphold the American cause. This is what I mean when I say that Christianity seems to be fused very thoroughly with patriotism. Now it is unthinkable that religion and patriotism should never coincide. Israel often identified God's will with her own national history. And we have had chapters in which our national life seemed to manifest divine guidance, and we seemed justified in believing that our cause was God's. But that every combatant's cause in this fearful struggle should be the Almighty's especial solicitude is unthinkable; and that in any nation the voice of the church should become merely an unqualified approval of the national cause, with no sense of the moral dangers that attend any fusing of the enthusiasm of a people until it becomes a mass-passion — all this discounts the church as a moral leader.

There can be little doubt that by a sharpened sense of ethical values shall the fruits of the church be tested by the world after the war. The world will have less patience than now with religious ceremonialism, if this be given the place of first importance, as though it were the saving element. Why! Irreligious men by thousands are giving their lives with a fine courage that is making thoughtful persons ask if this be not the real essence of religion, and if these boys, untouched by the church, are not accepted by Christ by virtue of being cleansed in this bloody sacrament of death for duty's sake? Now, Christianity cannot be reduced to mere goodness, however pure and lovely it may seem, without the loss of something essential and precious; Christian experience is something more than a valorous deed even though the deed be the giving of one's life; but this vast display of heroism which fills our hearts with exaltation while it fills our eyes with tears, and which assuredly reaches the heart of God, injects a new sensitiveness into the world's ethical judgments, and makes it more impatient of unreality, of pretentiousness or superficiality in the life of the church.

THE world will judge the church not alone by the pure passion of devotion that glows at its heart, but by the sincerity and directness with which Christian faith relates itself to the great ethical problems and tasks of the times.

A staggering task confronts us. We must rebuild the world. But how captivating the challenge is! One characteristic of Christianity at its purest is its unfailing hopefulness. Its spirit is the pioneering spirit. Its record is that it has achieved impossibilities; and the summons to do an impossible thing in the present hour constitutes one of the mightiest inspirations.

The war shall also bring a deepened dependence upon the supernatural element that lies at the core of the Christian Gospel. Perhaps this word "supernatural" hardly describes, as clearly as in days gone by, the element in Christianity of which I am thinking. For in these days we are clearly seeing that the so-called natural world is steeped through and through with divine action and divine meaning. I am thinking, however, of the Gospel record of the manifestation of Christ's personality upon a higher plane than that of our ordinary living—even the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. Surely the mourning world, all billowed with graves, shall lean more heavily upon the Gospel revelation concerning the life beyond the grave.

The world will face this great issue now as never before. All well to have the churches open, that we may minister to the soldier boys. Well to manifest the kindliness of the church by many new forms of ministration in these great days. But best of all to have them open, that human beings, whose spirits are trembling with the accents of the profound and searching question: "If a man die shall he live again?" may find in the Lord's house the comfort, consolation and assurance they need.

The Unreached Best

SUNDAY, November 18. Phil. 3 : 12. "Not as though I have already attained, or were already perfect, but I follow after." A visiting friend was in the studio of the late Mr. Chase, the famous American artist, and he asked him to show him his best picture. In reply Mr. Chase pointed to a canvas that was perfectly blank, and said, "That is my best!" It was the imaginary dwelling-place of an ideal which he had never realized, harmonies of form and color which he had seen but never captured and expressed. On that canvas he portrayed perfected glories which his brush toiled after in vain. There he saw his pattern in the mount. The glory receded before every attainment. He was ever drawing nearer, and yet it always seemed afar off. But it lured him, and he followed after.

And so it is in every healthy spiritual life. In the oratory of the soul there must be a vision of ever-deepening glory, and every spiritual attainment must expose more of its hidden wealth. There must be a picture hanging in the chamber of imagery which has never yet been incarnated in the lines of actual life. Always there must shine in our eager dreams a vision of a yet more wonderful whiteness of holiness, some more arresting and perfected strength, some deeper secret of peace, some rarer refinement of grace, some more splendid revelation of love. The unsearchable riches of Christ must continually beckon us to treasures that are not yet ours, and we must follow after.

There is a very real sense in which our consciousness of poverty is one of the assurances of progressive wealth. To gaze upon a glory which makes our possessions seem slim is itself a favoring token and a promise of large attainment. "Blessed are ye that hunger now!" It is the blessedness of a conscious want. The heart is craving a contemplated glory, and in the very craving is moving on to sure possession.

On the other hand the soul is beginning to be touched with death when it has the consciousness that its most glorious vision has been realized, and that its best is now in hand. "Woe unto you that are full!" Satisfaction is just the writing of "Ichabod"; for even the glory we have in hand will soon have departed. "Not that I have already attained," cries the apostle Paul. His best picture was still unpainted. His ideal was still a wonderful dream. But he pressed on toward the mark. J. H. J.

The Conquest of the Disagreeable

MONDAY, November 19. II Cor. 12 : 10. "I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake." It is self-evident that every life contains much that is disagreeable. No one, however high and however fortunate, is so far elevated above his fellows, or so far isolated from them, as to be independent of certain tasks which, if they be not wearisome by their drudgery, are disagreeable by their very monotony. Then there are innumerable vexatious and annoying circumstances arising out of our limitations of power and time, out of our misunderstandings and failures. Furthermore, we are of necessity entangled in affairs in which other people are interested, and those others are not always congenial. The disagreeable is a part of our lot; we cannot escape it. But we may conquer it. There is a state of mind, a point of view, which leads its possessor to a calm superiority to circumstances. An old Roman seeker after God said, "There is nothing good or evil, save in the will." And again, "God hath granted us these faculties by which we may bear every event without being broken or oppressed by it."

There is nothing in life which, however toilsome, however disagreeable it may be in itself, may not become both disciplinary and pleasurable. Everything depends on for whose sake we serve and suffer. Many a woman cooks for her own family who would not so cheerfully enter the domestic service of another household. Many a mother acts as nurse to her own children in sickness dangerous and repulsive, who could not be induced to perform the same service for strangers. Convince us that our Master calls us to lowly service, and we will do it with exceeding joy. Who of us would not feel honored to wash his feet, to gird ourselves with humble raiment that we might wait on him? Well, he wants us to do our duty, whether it be pleasant or obnoxious to us; and by so much as we do it, we are serving him. C. C. A.

Mourning the Dead

TUESDAY, November 20. I Thess. 4 : 13. "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope." Christians who mourn the loss of loved ones are here exhorted not to surrender themselves to immoderate grief. Paul employs a beautiful figure of speech when he speaks of death as a sleep. The comparison is very old; even the heathen knew it. But by them it was used as a gentle euphemism, to veil the terrible reality of death. They had no certain knowledge of a life after death. With most of them death was regarded as the end of all, and it was useless to hope for a happy future beyond. Nor does Paul, in speaking of death as a sleep, merely imply that the dead are unconscious and hence not touched any more by earthly troubles. The connection with the words which immediately follow shows that his main object in likening death to the repose of a sleeping person is to indicate that the state of death is not interminable. There will be an awakening when the voice of the great Awakener will be heard calling over the graveyards of the earth to them that sleep in the dust whence they were taken.

With this reflection the apostle would take the pang out of the mourners' grief. They will mourn when standing at the coffin and grave of friends. That is natural, nor does Scripture forbid the expression of such natural feelings. But they cannot, if they are believers in Christ, the Resurrection and the Life, mourn as those without hope.

"It is an artificial virtue and fictitious fortitude of heathen, when they pretend that we must entirely extract what is creaturely in us, and hold no terms with nature. Such a hard heart has never truly loved, and would fain dissemble before people. He is a Christian who, while experiencing sorrow, yet so restrains himself therein that the spirit rules over the flesh. . . . It is one thing when Christ, who wept himself, dries our tears, and another thing when men forbid them to flow." Luther. W. H. T. D.

Deborah's Victory

WEDNESDAY, November 21. Judges 4 : 14. "And Deborah said unto Barak, Up! for this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thine hands." Israel being without a king, Deborah comes to the rescue. She inspires Barak to gather ten thousand troops and to attack Sisera. She was a singer and leader among her people. Her songs excited to heroic devotion. Her country was at this time at the mercy of the savage Canaanites, who carried away the children of the people and destroyed the fruits of the field. With great faith in God she cried. "Up, Barak, and lead thy captivity captive." How ludicrous it looked for ten thousand of Israel to meet three hundred thousand of the enemy, who had, besides, ten thousand horse and nine hundred chariots of iron! How disdainfully Sisera must have looked upon his feeble antagonist! But during the battle a terrible storm filled the empty river beds with a torrent that swept the chariots of the Canaanites to destruction. Deborah, the prophetess and soldier, had won a great victory for her country. Then she sang her immortal song, which came out of struggle and suffering:

> The Lord came down for me against the mighty:
> The stars in their courses fought against Sisera!
> O my soul, thou hadst trodden down strength.
> Let them that love Him be as the sun.
> When he goeth forth in his might!

So Luther sang,

> A mighty fortress is our God;
> A bulwark never failing.

Deborah's victory came in answer to prayer and faith; the mightiest battalions did not win. Weak, unprepared, undisciplined Israel triumphed gloriously. A noble woman teaches the world that right and truth will win against force and might. E. W. C.

A Thanksgiving Prayer

THURSDAY, November 22. Eph. 5 : 20. "Giving thanks always for all things to God." O thou whose gifts are endless and whose grace is free, we thank thee for our lives and for thy love. That love explains the world. The beauty of the earth and sea, the glory of the boundless sky, the wealth of treasure for the hand of man, the greater wealth of mind and soul, all, all are tokens of thy more than friendly care. If we are free, thy truth hath made us so. If we have peace, it is because thy Spirit causes us to rest. If plenty fills our bins, thy sun and rain have been our slaves. So at our feasts, we lift glad hands of faith to thee. May graceless meat not be our sin today.

Cause us to ask our fathers whence their strength to fight and build. May we look back and plainly see the origin of things—the faith that laid the state's foundations deep; the power of prayer that kept the martyrs strong, and made them prophets of the coming age; the patience which endured that we might be the heirs of freedom and the sons of light; the hope that beckoned every pilgrim on the path to present safety and content.

For all the good and great of spirit and of brain; for all who ever sought or still do seek the secrets of thy Word; for all to whom thy works are as a volume to be read, we give thee glory and exalt thy name.

For mercies great and small; for friendships near and far; for triumphs of the truth; for conquests by the Cross; for growing faith of man in man; for lips that laugh, and tongues that sing, and eyes that glow, and tears that cleanse the heart, and death that opens wide the gates of life, we give thee thanks. Yea, for the clearer sight of things unseen which we acquire as years go by and age comes on, and for the light that waxes brighter as the sun goes down, we praise thee this Thanksgiving Day. Thou art our gracious Saviour and our God. We are thy children and we give thee praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen. C. C. A.

God Has Not Forgotten

FRIDAY, November 23. Zech. 9 : 11,12. "As for thee also, by the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water. Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope: even today do I declare that I will render double unto thee." In days of a public calamity which overwhelms a whole nation the Church of God is drawn into the vortex of universal suffering. God does not seem to discriminate between the righteous and the evil-doers at such times. But it is a mistake to think that he has forgotten the peculiar relation in which he stands to his believers. He brought Lot out of burning Sodom and would have spared the entire city if he had found ten righteous men in it. God remembers the covenant, sealed with the blood of his Son, which forever attaches him to those who put their trust in him.

His children too should remember the covenant. When they find themselves in straitened circumstances, hemmed in on all sides, with no avenue of escape open to them, they should wait for the salvation which God will work for them. They are "prisoners of hope": their very distresses become a sheltering confinement to them, not a dungeon of perdition. Let them cling to this conviction and plead the power of the blood of Jesus, who is the surety of the covenant to God. Let them not regard the pit without water, the dismal, comfortless condition in which they are for the present, as their permanent abiding place. It is merely an experience through which they have to pass. Beyond lie prosperity and rest for them, doubly as great as the sum total of all their distresses and sufferings. Prisoners of hope, then, are not prisoners at all, except in appearance.

Victory in God

SATURDAY, November 24. Isa. 28 : 20. "For the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it; and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it." Men who plan for themselves, independently of God, find at the last only the narrowness of the grave, where the eulogy is engraved on the monument, "Here he lies." The bed of his death is too short to rest upon and the covering of self too narrow for the wrapping of his soul. In what a great contrast is God's benevolent providence compared with man's shortsightedness and selfishness!

When we trust God, a speck expands into a star. When one makes a covenant with death and an agreement with hell, the light of the soul dies, and the refuge of lies is swept away.

Israel had an alliance with both Assyria and Egypt, and, as some nations do today, was playing one against the other, finally losing both. Ephraim erred through strong drink, so that the prophet exclaimed, "Woe to the drunkards of Ephraim, who are swallowed up of wine, who shall be trodden under feet." Then Isaiah pleads that all should trust in the strong and mighty God, who is a sure foundation, so that he who believeth shall not be ashamed.

The world of men and nations never will find rest and victory outside of the heavenly Father. Soul rest cometh not from couches of human build nor national peace from diplomacy. God is in the world of history; He alone can give the peace of security and liberty. Uneasy lies the head of him who does not wear the crown of righteousness. All the great of earth come to know at the last that God and one man are a majority.

Are we building on the Rock of Ages or on the sands of time? What a vital question for one who is to be a householder among immortals? Christ is the only sure foundation stone for mansions to rest upon in the streets of the celestial city. E. W. C.

Faith in Action

LIKE the strong wind which shook the mulberry trees in the Valley of Rephaim, sounding like the marching of an invisible armed host calling the men to Israel for action, so the power of the Spirit is shaking the Christian Church today. It is the signal to go forth and conquer, the announcement of divine reinforcement in the warfare against sin. That it is arousing all the denominations has already been shown in the outspoken character of the addresses in the Religious Congress at Pittsburgh. That assembly gave forth a clear call, to which the churches everywhere should give heed.

That such an event should have happened on the anniversary of the Reformation is, of itself, a remarkable coincidence, since it reveals the need of a new reformation and of world-wide spiritual readjustment. It had almost seemed that the grand old ideals of the Church had been obscured by the smoke of the tremendous conflict, and that the old heathen war-gods were in the ascendant.

We believe that God is able to, and does, overrule even the worst of our blunders and tangles for ultimate good. He can so overrule even this war. But he loves to be helped by having us seek to know his will and to work with him for the fulfilment of his purposes. Recently a call was issued to the churches urging them to give the war its right interpretation and its true spiritual significance. National sin, false ambitions, jealousy, distrust and gigantic selfishness led to the volcanic outburst which is devastating Europe. It was urged in that call that men everywhere should yield new obedience to the will of God the Father, who in Christ Jesus gave himself for the world's redemption, and who "invites us to share with him his ministry of reconciliation," and to strive to rebuild on this desolated earth the commonwealth of mankind and to make of the world kingdoms the Kingdom of Christ. This is the spirit of the new reformation that is needed now—the breaking down of the narrow bounds of nationalism, with its antagonisms and suspicions and hatreds. Before God all are equal and alike, all one blood and kindred.

Students of the Word everywhere believe we are now in an age of prophetic fulfilment. The Church of Christ throughout the world is beginning to comprehend this and to realize that its religion henceforth must be vital and not formal; that it must preach Christ and the coming of his kingdom in the hearts of men.

In a recent address by Robert E. Speer before a large gathering of churches in Washington, he regarded our call to world evangelism as an imperative one. There should be no thought of diminishing the spiritual activities of the Church and its allied organizations. The Lord's plans are on a large scale. If it is the divine purpose to reorganize human affairs through and after this war, as many firmly believe, if we are his faithful servants we should plan with a view to the fullest and most complete cooperation. Some have suggested a diminution of church activity during the war, but the speaker urged that the Church must never surrender. It must not only fulfil all its duties, but prepare to meet the larger demands. The Church's great work calls not only for consecration of hearts but of the means and the life, in carrying out the "Great Commission."

The day of miracles is not past. With faith in God and energy in his service, we can triumph over every obstacle. Human power and intellect have proved impotent to solve the great problem of the war; yet there is a solution. Dr. Jefferson of the Broadway Tabernacle of New York stated the case thus: "If there is any solution at all to this great problem, there is only one that is, Christ. Christ alone can meet the need of the world and unite the hearts of men."

If, when the universal turmoil has died down and the world stands longing and expectant, the Church, with increased faith and new-born zeal, were ready to place herself unreservedly at God's disposal for this great service, who shall say that the miracle of leading the nations into the new age of peace and righteousness might not be accomplished through her as the chosen vessel after all? It is surely a goal worth striving for.

A Church for Mr. Sunday

SOMEBODY has apparently been whispering a suggestion in the ear of Brother W. A. Sunday, to the effect that he can be called to one of the leading churches of New York if he be inclined to accept. It is a tempting offer, no doubt; but we venture the opinion that the evangelist would do better service in a church of his own than one where the denominational harness might fit a bit too snugly at times. The work of an evangelist, to be effective, should be free from all unnecessary bonds and limitations. New York would welcome Billy Sunday as a permanent fixture, and our people would fill the biggest tabernacle to hear him. They would rejoice in the spiritual blessings that would follow his fearless preaching of the Gospel, and they would gladly help in shepherding the converts. In a church wholly interdenominational he would never lack for an audience. What with his vivid oratory and Rodeheaver's stirring songs of the Christian life, such a ministry, we feel assured, would be remarkably blessed. And that is the real point after all. Besides, a zealous church, planned and conducted on a large and liberal scale, would be a mighty center of nation-wide evangelism, radiating its influence to every point of the compass, and sending forth its leader on Pauline missions to quicken other churches. That would be the ideal pastorate for him, and one in which he would find ample room for the extension of his rare evangelistic powers.

Dr. Jowett and the Christian Herald

OUR entire Family Circle will be glad to read this note from our good friend Rev. J. H. Jowett, and especially the assurance that he will continue to be a leading member of our contributing staff during the coming year:

New York, October 22, 1917.

DEAR EDITOR: I have received your very kind letter of October 18. I am quite willing to continue the Meditations for the coming year. They have brought me into fellowship with a very large number of readers who have been kind enough to write me personally of the help they have received. I shall be glad also to continue the sermonic contributions at regular intervals.

Yours sincerely,
(Signed) J. H. JOWETT.

To the Editor, the Christian Herald.

Dr. Jowett's pulpit in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York is a famous one. But through the pages of the Christian Herald—in which he preaches the first sermon of every month and has done so for several years—he reaches the widest parish in the world today. His ministry is at all times stimulating and helpful, being of that broad, generous, Christlike kind that carries a welcome message to men and women in every rank of life and of all denominations. Associated with Dr. Jowett in Gospel presentation in this journal are the foremost representatives of all the leading denominations—Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Congregational, Reformed, Disciples and others—a goodly company, who give the Bible truths of Christianity in living and eloquent language, applying them to the needs of the remarkable times in which we live. With such a spiritual aggregation, the Christian Herald will continue to be more than ever a welcome visitor in the homes of America.

The National Spirit

FROM the foundation of this Republic, patriotism and generosity have been two of the dominant characteristics of our people. In times of peace we have reached out all over the world to seek and help the suffering; and now that war time is here, we are doing the same Good Samaritan duty with intensified zeal. It is quite in keeping that a nation which can pass the five billion mark in a Liberty Loan should be as great in its philanthropy as in its patriotism. Now that the strain of the last few weeks has relaxed, let us hope that the needs of the war sufferers will again receive generous attention. Armenia and Syria, the President reminds us, have over two million destitute, including four thousand orphans, who look to us for aid. Jerusalem and other districts of Palestine have multitudes of helpless ones also appealing to us. Belgium's poor fortunately are being relieved systematically by our government, but Holland has between five and eight hundred thousand Belgian refugees who still need our aid. These causes are urgent and should be generously remembered. And while the spirit of helpfulness is active, let us not overlook our own flesh and blood in camp and at the front. We are sending thousands of Testaments and Christian Heralds weekly for the men of our army and navy. With the cooperation of our Family Circle we mean to keep up this spiritual stream at the flood until all needs are supplied. Think over these matters, and if you have not done so already, give your offering now that the good work may go on without interruption.

The Little Blind Lady

THE tall man helped the frail little lady up the high steps of the trolley car. And then, as she hesitated, gropingly, in front of the door, he spoke in a stage whisper to the conductor. "Say, look after her, will you?" he said. "She's blind!"

The sunshine, golden yellow, fell in a shimmering cloak across the floor of the car. The girl opposite us had wonderful blue eyes, shaded by curling black lashes. We had not noticed them very carefully; neither had we noticed the dimples in the cheek of the laughing baby in the seat next to ours, nor the glitter of the jewel in the business man's necktie. We had not noticed the blaze of color on the city streets we were passing through, or the scarlet flowers that grew gloriously in the window boxes of a public school that stood—a huge oasis—on a corner. The little blind lady sat across the aisle, a vague smile upon her frail face. And suddenly, with a pang of pity at our heart, we knew that she couldn't see anything—the laughing baby, the vivid colors, or even the sunlight. Blind! . . .

And we wondered, as we sat there, how many people never stop to think of the beautiful things that are so near them every day? It's easy enough to complain when there is rain or dust or ugliness to trouble one; but we, the majority of us, have learned to pass over the beauty we are accustomed to seeing. Sunbeams and dancing eyes are commonplace things, to be accepted of life with scarcely a nod of thanks.

"Be careful, of her, will you?" the tall man said to the conductor. "She's blind!" And, as we watched the frail little lady take her seat opposite, we knew that others in the car were blinder than she.

Thanksgiving at the Old Home

AS Thanksgiving Day approaches, what heart that is not calloused with greed and selfishness does not ache with longing for the old home?

At this mystical season, if at no other, memories of childhood become smiling angels that beckon us back through the years.

Idle sentiment? Not at all!

All over our land Thanksgiving brings back to the old home the children and the children's children, once more to set our lips to the spring of love that is pure and undefiled.

Whether we turn back to it from successes and joys, or from failures and sorrows, the old home is ever a sanctuary of virtues and the sweetest earthly interpretation of heaven.

At the old home the king of finance and the prodigal once more become brothers and learn that the things which sometimes seem so important to us in this world are, after all, but a thin veneer.

Whether we be wise or ignorant, rich or poor, great or little, the old home offers us satisfaction and inspiration to be found nowhere else in the world.

If Thanksgiving had no other meaning than just this—that it turns us back to the old home, that nursery of the infinite hope, and to the loves and dreams and longings and resolves of youth, it would still be one of the happiest and most helpful days in all the year.

Scrub, Scrub, Scrub

IF we are to sterilize the mouthpieces of telephones every day, to kill the bacteria and prevent infection, and are to scrub the door-knobs every day for the same reason, why not be consistent, and go on scrubbing and scrubbing everything with which we come in contact?

If these bacteria must be cleaned out once a day, why not once an hour, or once a minute? The pestiferous things are apt to get in any second.

Of course, everybody knows that drinking-water must be not only boiled, but distilled.

We have all often enough been warned that handshaking is dangerous and kissing deadly. All of which warning we have all duly observed, of course.

Now, after having long and virtuously refrained from raw water and from the other enticements, it is hard to be informed by bacteriologists that we still are in momentary danger from microbes unless we scrub, scrub, scrub.

And when we get used to the scrubbing and learn to look upon it as a matter of course instead of a hardship, may not the microbes steal another march on us through the scrub-brush?

Maybe we shall have to sterilize the soap and then sterilize the sterilizer. Bacteriologists are insatiable. They never know where to stop.

We may soon become as ridiculous as the old Salemites in the days of witchcraft.

McKinley Memorial Dedicated

THE McKinley memorial erected at Niles, Ohio, the birthplace of the martyred president, was dedicated the other day with impressive ceremonies. The memorial is an imposing building of granite standing two stories high. It graces a beautiful park overlooking the city. The main features of the shrine are an auditorium seating 1,000 persons, a public library, and a relic room which will house personal and historic objects associated with the life of McKinley. The main portico is supported by six Ionic columns and the facade of each wing carries similar supports in sectional form. The completed memorial cost over half a million dollars. Many prominent Americans participated in the dedication. Ex-President Taft, who signed an act of Congress providing for the erection of the building, was the principal speaker at the opening ceremonies. William McKinley was born in Niles, Ohio, on January 29, 1843, was a student at Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa., and a teacher in the public schools, enlisted as a private in the Civil War, and rose to the rank of major. At the close of the war he studied law at the Albany Law School, and entered on the practice of law at Canton, Ohio, which he always called his home, and where a magnificent monument was erected in his honor in 1907. Major McKinley was a conspicuous member of Congress for many terms, and his name is associated with the high tariff bill passed during the administration of President Harrison. He was elected to the presidency and was reelected. At a reception in the Music Hall at the Pan-American Exposition, he was assassinated. The whole nation wept bitter tears at his untimely death. He was brilliant, eloquent, patriotic, tactful and affectionate. His reverence for his mother, whom he kissed on the day of his inaugural, saying, "Mother, I owe this all to you," was beautiful, and his tender, loving care for his invalid wife was pathetic. He was a devout Christian. One day he said to his pastor, "What kind of a meeting did you have last night? I was not able to get out." The pastor answered, "A very good one." President McKinley said, "I want to know whether there were any forward to the altar for prayers; that is the kind of meeting that I call good." It is the grateful, the valuable thing to build monuments of marble to such a man, but his real monuments are those he built in his splendid character, his love for his country, his kindness of spirit, his ability as an executor, his devotion to mother and wife, and his intense love for Christ. Christ refers to this love as a memorial: "Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached . . . this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her." (Mark 14 : 9.)

Edward Dithmar, Editor, Dead

EDWARD A. DITHMAR, an able and prominent journalist of New York and the United States, who for forty years was on the editorial staff of the New York Times, died in the Roosevelt Hospital after a surgical operation on October 17. The metropolitan papers the next day gave ample space to his biography, and the Times had a large editorial comment and appreciation of his character, ability and service to the public. His funeral was held at the Lutheran Evangelical Church, and the pastor, Rev. Dr. Charles J. Smith, paid an eloquent tribute to the deceased in which he said: "To very few men is it given to possess so close an approximation to the universal mind. Whether dealing with the troubled waters of European politics, with the tangled skein of Latin-American relations, with the appraisal of some new development of dramatic art, or with some phase of New York's civic life, Mr. Dithmar could ever be depended upon to exhibit that poise of thought and utterance which made his words always sane and his thought not trivial, but fundamental. In his estimate of persons he was ever generous. His praise was never flattery, nor was his censure ever born of bitterness. Because of this broadly sympathetic and ecumenical spirit Mr. Dithmar wove himself into the fabric of a great metropolitan daily. Through it his voice was heard veritably to the uttermost parts of he earth. Its editorial page, so strikingly impersonal, was lighted up by the fire of his radiant personality. Many who read his work felt a spiritual kinship with the author, even though they had never heard his name." There is this reference to literary power among the Hebrews: "Out of Machir came down governors, and out of Zebulun they that handle the pen of the writer." (Judges 5 : 14.)

Little Boat, Big Ocean

WHILE making a trip around the world in his thirty-two-foot schooner Sir Francis, Captain Thomas Drake of Seattle, Wash., has just touched the port of New York. Two years ago Captain Drake left Seattle in his little ship, sailed down the Pacific, through the Panama Canal, and up the Atlantic. His schooner is ten-foot beam, draws three feet of water, is of five tons burden, and carries 1,100 square feet of canvas. The craft has an auxilliary engine which is seldom used, as she is capable of making from six to ten miles an hour under sail. The captain is making the tour of the world alone and supports himself by selling shells. At first men navigated the sea with boats propelled with oars. Then they put up a piece of bark or stretched out the skin of an animal to catch the wind, and then they made the sails of cloth. That was the best that could be done for thousands of years till recent times, when steam was utilized to propel the ship. Captain Drake's little sailing vessel on the big ocean calls to mind this allusion to the sailing vessel, in which the first missionary journey was made: "And when they had taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder bands, and hoisted up the mainsail to the wind, and made toward shore." (Acts 27 : 40.)

Orville Wright Gets Medal

ON October 27 Lord Northcliffe, head of the British War Mission to the United States, went to Dayton, Ohio, to confer the Albert medal on Orville Wright. The medal was presented by the Royal Society of Arts of England, which awards a medal each year to some one prominent in the arts and sciences. The nation is proud of the honor conferred on its worthy and illustrious son, the father of one of the greatest inventions in the world's history. In the spiritual world we have all been furnished with airplanes with which to navigate the upper air. We are like birds, with feet to walk the earth and engage in its materialities and duties; we are like birds with wings to fly above the smoke and noise of the earth, up and out into the altitudes of truth, righteousness, love and life. We are bird-men, able to overcome the gravitation of the earth and sin. The wings with which we fly are faith. This great fact is thus expressed: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength: they shall mount up with wings as eagles." (Isa. 40 : 31.)

Girl Saves Man's Life

MISS AUGUSTA WARDELMAN of Hoboken, New Jersey, rescued a man from being trampled to death under the hoofs of a frightened team of truck horses the other day, while a crowd of men and women looked on and cheered her heroic deed. The man she saved was Henry Kempton. He was driving a wagon laden with fruit when the wagon was overturned and, the man's legs becoming entangled in the reins, he was dragged to the street and would have been trampled to death by the horses had not this eighteen-year-old girl rushed in and dragged him out of danger. Miss Wardelman is a telegraph operator and was just starting from her father's house to work when the accident occurred near their house. She was so overcome with the shock that she was not able to go to her work that day. There are some little, mean, selfish people in the world, but there are also many beautiful, brave, unselfish characters, who honor themselves and bless their fellows. It is the boast of our civilization that the heroic in human conduct is a matter of everyday occurrence. Never a day goes by that some boy or girl, some man or woman, does not risk life to save another. This heroism is in imitation of the example of Christ, who died that the world might live, who gave his life that we might find ours. The principle he thus lays down: "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." (Matt. 16 : 25.)

Wild Ducks Visit City

WILD ducks in their migration usually fly high above the cities, following some river course on their journeys north and south. A large flock of ducks going south to spend the winter concluded to visit Lincoln, Nebraska, the other night. They circled round and round, coming lower and lower till their squawkings aroused many people. Mr. Hoover, a watchman, turned on an arc light to see what effect it would have on the waterfowl. It attracted them; they flew around and closer to it, a number striking the telephone and telegraph wires so hard as to kill and stun them. Hoover filled a game sack with the beautiful blue-wing teal ducks, and a number of other men came on the ground and indulged in the easy task of duck-hunting without boat or gun. Some of the lower creatures, like some people, prefer darkness, but most of them are attracted by the light. In the spiritual realm light does not act as a decoy to injury and death, but as a means of life. Christ is the light that gives life to men. This is what the beloved disciple who knew him said of him: "In him was life: and the life was the light of men." (John 1 : 4.)

An Army of Miners

How Uncle Sam's Soldiers Are Fighting for Us in the Iron Ranges of Lake Superior

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1917, by Frank G. Carpenter

OUR war in Europe depends not only upon the men behind the guns, but also upon the men behind the men behind the guns. The latter class includes our mighty industrial army on this side the ocean. It includes the men who are working the farms, factories and machine shops, and last, but not least, those who are working the mines. It is of one division of our mining soldiers that I am writing today from Virginia, Minnesota. It is of the men who are getting out iron ore here in northern Minnesota. There are more than 20,000 of them in this district alone, and they are furnishing the raw material for the steel that makes the guns the soldiers carry, the projectiles which are thrown into the trenches, and the mighty tanks which, like cars of Juggernaut, crush to death everything in their way.

A deep cut in the great ore beds, from which the ore is hauled to the docks to be dumped into the waiting steamers

From here comes the material for our battleships, our airplanes and all of the various kinds of motor transportation. These soldiers are now digging out the ore for the steel rails of the new roads of France and Belgium.

Our mining army, which is now under the direct command of Uncle Sam, is as live a factor in the situation of today as the soldiers we are training to send to the front. It is thoroughly organized. Every mine is surrounded by guards and the danger points have federal soldiers to aid the local police. The ore ports of Lake Superior demand credentials and passes from every one who comes near the docks, and the waterways from here to the steel plants are protected by the United States and Canadian armies. This is especially noticeable at the Soo, where there are camps along the canals on both sides of the boundary, and at the unloading docks and steel plants in the great cities of the lower lakes. It is also in evidence at the open pit mines and ore piles. I have hardly been able to pick up a piece of Minnesota ore without a policeman appearing beside me.

ALL summer long these mining soldiers have been getting out ore as never before. The output last year was more than 66,000,000 tons, and this has been largely increased since we entered the war. There has been one continuous succession of ore trains moving from the Mesabi and other ranges down the mountains to the ports, and the hundreds of great ore steamers have had the fires blazing under their boilers ever since they plowed their way through the ice for their first cargoes last spring. The mine operators are now preparing to carry on some open pit work during the winter.

According to recent statistics made by the Oliver Iron Mining Company, nine-tenths of all its employees on the Mesabi range are Europeans. Fifty-six per cent. are Austrians, a little more than 11 per cent. are Italians, and 14 per cent. are from Finland. The same proportion probably obtains in the mines of the other companies. At the beginning of the war it was feared that a large number of these foreign laborers would go back to Europe to join their colors, but time has shown that they prefer to remain here.

As to the Austrians, the most of them are out of sympathy with the action of their country in joining the Germans, and they, as well as the other foreigners, show a strong spirit of Americanism. The region has furnished many recruits for the army. It has taken more than its quota of Liberty bonds, and has subscribed liberally to the Red Cross.

THE spirit of the country is democratic. The people vote their own improvements, and although considerable welfare work is done by the mining companies, the revenues of the towns make them practically independent.

Notwithstanding its percentage of foreigners, this region is perhaps the most advanced in sanitary and civic conditions of all the mining regions of the United States. The ordinary gold mining region plays out within a few years. This iron ore industry will last for generations, and the miners have built homes as though they expected to stay. Every family has its own house, and there are no such things as blocks and barracks. The buildings are substantial. Many of them are of brick and stone. They have fine lawns and gardens, and architecturally the towns are as good as any of their size in the country.

This is especially so of the schools and other public buildings. Every little town has its high school and graded schools, with swimming pools, large playgrounds, and gymnasiums. The teachers are better paid than those in cities of six times the population. There is a school at Aurora which has a battery of sewing machines and a range of kitchenettes. It has carpenter and metal-working shops, and a gymnasium with shower baths adjacent. It has also a theater, an athletic field, and a ten-acre patch for school gardens.

Some of the schoolhouses have marble wainscoting, and their fixtures are nickel-plated. At Hibbing they examine the children as to eyesight and hearing and insist that their teeth be kept in the best of condition. It is the same here in Virginia, which is a town of 15,000 population, and also in the smaller municipalities of the range.

I have never traveled through a mining country which has roads so good as those of these Minnesota mountains. The waste ore furnishes much of the material for making the roads. This is smooth and hard in fine weather, but it takes on a paintlike film when it rains. The permanent roads have a surface of gravel or macadam, and they are now talking of a concrete driveway eighty miles long, from Hibbing to Duluth. There is one county, St. Louis, which spends $600,000 a year upon its public highways, and the town of Hibbing has appropriated $178,000 for road improvement.

As to the towns, the streets are well paved, and lighted with big electric group lights on bronze posts. In fact, it is so bright at night that the chickens cannot sleep. A man in Hibbing recently tried to raise hens, but the light was so brilliant that he had to shut them up in a dark room as soon as the lights went on, to get them to lay in the day time.

Most of the towns have public libraries and municipal parks. They have tennis courts and bowling alleys. There are banks, hotels and stores everywhere and of late almost no saloons. A great part of the region is bone dry, and some of it has been so for a long time. One section of the Mesabi range secured its land through an old Indian treaty which provided that no liquor should be sold within the reservation limits. This regulation has now been revived, and under it no liquor can be sold in the greater part of the mining regions of Minnesota. It has wiped out the saloons of Hibbing and has greatly improved social and business conditions. I asked one of the citizens about this. He replied:

"We are far better off than in the past. Our labor is more steady, the people are more orderly, the stores are doing more business, and there has been a great increase in the bank savings and in the bank deposits."

THIS high condition of civilization and public improvements in this mining region is due to the fact that the state and the people to some extent have conserved the minerals that lie in the ground and make the operators give them a small share of the profits. The state owns certain valuable iron properties and allows the ore to be taken out only upon the payment of royalties. It gets, I am told, something like a million dollars a year from its leased mines, and this goes into a school fund of which the interest only is available. The interest already supports a large part of the public educational institutions of the state, and that from the kindergartens to the universities. The royalties on the ore now in sight are estimated at $35,000,000. In addition, the state collects one or two cents a ton on all of the ore taken out of the mines which it does not own, and there also are local town, county and school district taxes upon these same ore properties. An official of one of the largest companies tells me that his taxes are equal to about 25 cents a ton on all the ore he takes out. The mines pay annual taxes also upon all the ore in sight—that is, upon all the ore that is known to exist in the earth. The assessed valuation of the various mining properties is more than $270,000,000, and the tax upon this brings a big revenue. There is a tax also on the transportation of the ore which amounts to something like a million dollars a year. Indeed, the iron mines of Minnesota pay one-fifth of all the real estate taxes of the commonwealth.

THE bulk of the ore now in the ground belongs to parties outside the state. Most of it is owned by the United States Steel Corporation, whose branch, the Oliver Iron Mining Company, has valuable mines in every range about Lake Superior, and which through its hundred and more great ore vessels sends down tens of millions of tons every season. Vast fortunes have been made out of the mines, and other fortunes are yet to come. The amount of ore in sight steadily increases, notwithstanding the prediction that the deposits are playing out, and that they will soon be exhausted. Some experts have given them a life of fifty years, and others say that these Mesabi mines will play out within less than twenty-five. The amount taken out last year about Lake Superior was 65,000,000 tons, and the product next year will probably be greater. Nevertheless Mr. West, the manager of the eastern division of the mines of the Oliver Iron Mining Company, tells me they have more iron in sight than at any time previous in the history of the Lake Superior region. There is more in the Marquette range than was supposed to exist thirty years ago; and this is also true of these great ranges here. New deposits are discovered every day.

It is now sixty-seven years since iron was known to exist in this part of the world. A little was shipped from the edge of the Mesabi mountains in 1850, and at about the close of our civil war a government geologist reported that there was ore of value in several places back of Duluth. In 1883 the first important shipment of ore from Minnesota to Cleveland was made. This amounted to 62,000 tons, and it was the father of the millions of tons which have gone down to the ports of Lake Erie this year.

The first millionaires of this part of the world made their money out of lumber. Among them was Mr. Weyerhauser, who might be called the Rockefeller of the lumber industry of the great northwest. He had bought the timber from a large part of the Mesabi range and had paid more than a million and a half dollars for it. He was offered the land as well, the whole tract being priced to him at $100,000. He refused it, notwithstanding his surveyors had told him how the needles of their compasses indicated the presence of iron there. Since then the ore from that hundred-thousand-dollar tract has already yielded more than half a billion dollars and the values still in the ground are ten times as great. Had Weyerhauser bought the tract, his estate might now be the richest in the world.

It was two lumbermen, the Merritt brothers, who first disclosed the enormous value of the Mesabi iron range. As the story goes, they found ore in the roots of a fallen tree which had ripped up the earth around it. They set a crew of men to digging, and the result was the Mountain iron mine, which now belongs to the Steel Trust and is operated by the Oliver Iron Mining Company. It has produced many million tons of ore, and its output has amounted to tens of millions of dollars. The Merritts also discovered the Biwabic mine, which commenced shipping ore about twenty-five years ago. It also has produced vast quantities of ore, and its output in 1915 was more than 380,000 tons. The total ore product of the Mesabi range up to the present has been considerably over 400,000,000 tons; that of the Vermilion range has exceeded 40,000,000 tons, and that of the Cayuna range more than 5,000,000 tons. All of these ranges lie in Minnesota and are among the largest producers of the world today. It is claimed by expert geologists that this state has something like a billion and a half tons of ore yet in sight.

In addition to the Minnesota deposits are the iron ore bodies of Wisconsin and Michigan, on the south side of the lake. These were the first to be operated, and in 1915 they were still producing more than 13,000,000 tons. The first iron ore about Lake Superior was discovered just about seventy-two years ago. The man who found it was Philo Everett, who had come from Jackson, Mich., to prospect the southern shores of the lake. He had fallen in with a couple of Indians, who offered to guide him to a mountain of iron. They traveled six weeks when the Indians pointed to a black hill in the distance, saying that that was the mountain, but that they dared not go near it for fear of the evil spirits they believed always hovered about it. Philo Everett continued the journey and found a mountain 150 feet high, composed of solid ore, which looked as bright as a bar of iron just broken. He had seven permits from the Secretary of War, each entitling him to lay a claim to one square mile of mining land. He located his claims, and with his pockets full of nuggets, made his way back to his home. Shortly after that Marquette was founded as a shipping port for that ore field, and within a half century the iron that came from it brought twice as much as was paid for all the gold of California. Later on the Gogebic and Menominee ranges were discovered, and these, together with the Marquette range, have already yielded more than 308,000,000 tons of ore, worth at present prices over $2,000,000,000.

TENNELLY looked up and raised his eyebrows as Courtland closed the door. "Guess you needn't have written that letter, after all!" chuckled Bill Ward. "I thought Gila would get in her little old work!"

"Well, it's written and mailed, so that doesn't do any good now. And, anyway, it's always well to have more than one string to your bow!" growled Tennelly. Courtland in love! He wasn't exactly sure he liked it. Courtland and Gila! What kind of a girl was Gila, anyway? Was she good enough for Court? He must look into this.

"Say, Bill, why don't you introduce me to your cousin? I think it's about time I had a chance to judge for myself how things are getting on," growled Tennelly, presently.

"Sure!" said Bill. "Good idea! Why didn't you mention it before? How about going now? It's only half past ten. No, it isn't too late for Gila. She never goes to bed till midnight, not if there's anything interesting on. Wait. I'll call her up and see."

So it came about that an hour after Gila had sat in the firelight with Courtland and listened, puzzled, to his reverent talk of a soul-friendship, she ushered into the same room her cousin and Tennelly. She met Tennelly with a challenge in her eye.

For Tennelly was tall and strikingly handsome. He had those deep black eyes that hold one's gaze; yet there was behind his look something strong, dashing, scholarly. Gila saw at once that he was distinguished in his way, and though her thoughts were strangely held by Courtland she could not let one like this go by unchallenged. So she received Tennelly graciously, boldly, impressively, and in three minutes was talking with that daring intimacy that young people of her style love to affect; and Tennelly, fascinated by her charms, yet seeing through them and letting her know he saw through them, was fencing with her delightfully. He knew women! Understood this one at a glance. She was not the girl Court ought to have. She would break old Court's heart if he married her.

So he laughed and joked with Gila, while Bill Ward sat and watched them both, chuckling away to himself.

And Courtland, on his knees, talked with God!

THE next morning Courtland awoke with a pleasant sensation of eagerness to see what life had in store for him. Was this really the wonderful experience of love into which he had begun to enter? He thought of Gila all in halos now. The questionings and unpleasantness were forgotten. He told himself that she would one day see and understand the wonderful experience through which he had been passing. He would tell her just as soon as possible.

Before he left his room that morning he did something he had never done before in college; he locked his door and knelt beside his bed to pray, with a strong sweet sense of the Presence standing beside him, and breathing power into his soul.

He had not much to ask for himself. He simply craved that Presence, and it had never seemed so close. As he unlocked his door and hurried down the hall to the dining-room he marveled that a thing so sweet had been so long neglected from his life. Prayer! How he had sneered at it! Yet it was a reasonable thing, after all, now that he had come believing.

NURSE WRIGHT was on hand promptly at the place appointed. She was armed with a list of written instructions. They went to work at once, setting aside the things to be sold; folding and packing the scanty wardrobe and putting by themselves the clothes and things that had belonged to little Aleck. One incident brought tears to their eyes. In moving out the trunk a large pasteboard box fell down, and the contents dropped upon the floor. The nurse stooped to pick up the things, some pieces of an old overcoat of fine, dark-blue material, cut into small garments, basted, ready to be sewed; a tissue-paper pattern in a printed envelope marked "Boy's suit." On the cover in a child's stiff little printing letters, the inscription, "Aleck's new Sunday suit," and underneath, like a sub-title, in small letters, "Made out of father's best overcoat."

"Poor little kid!" said Courtland. "He never got to wear it!"

"He's wearing something far better!" said the nurse, cheerfully.

Courtland looked at her thoughtfully. "You believe in the resurrection, don't you?"

"I certainly do!" said the nurse. "If I didn't I'd get another job. You are a college student. I suppose you've got beyond believing things. It isn't the fashion to believe in God and the Bible any more, I understand, not if you're supposed to have any brains. But I thank God he's left me the resurrection. And when you come to face the loss of those you love you'll wish you believed in it, too."

"But I do," said Courtland, quietly, making his second confession of faith. "I never thought much about it till lately. It goes along with a Christ, of course. There had to be a resurrection if there was a Christ!"

"Well, I certainly am glad there's one college student that has some sense!" said the nurse, looking at him with admiration. "I guess you had a good mother."

"No," said Courtland, shaking his head. "I never knew my own mother. I was like all the rest of the fellows—thought I knew it all, and didn't believe anything till something happened! I was in a fire and one of the fellows died! He was a great Christian, and I saw his face when he died! And then, afterward—maybe you'll think I'm nuts when I tell you—but Christ came and stood by me in the smoke and talked with me and I knew him! He's been with me more or less ever since."

THE nurse looked at him curiously, a strange light in her eyes.

"No! I don't think you're nuts!" she said, brusquely. "I think you're the only sensible man I've met in a long time. It stands to reason if there is a Christ he'd come to people that way sometimes. I never had any vision, or anything that I know of, but I've always known in my heart there was a Christ and he was helping me! I don't know how I know it, but I know it and that's enough for me!"

"Say, I guess we're sort of relations, aren't we?" laughed Courtland, holding out his hand.

She took the offered hand and gripped it warmly. "I knew you must be different, somehow, when you went out to hunt for my patient so late at night that way," she said.

Courtland went out presently, bringing back a second-hand man with whom he made a quiet bargain, and it was not long before the little room was dismantled and empty.

They went together to a department store and purchased a charming little bag with a lot of traveling accessories in plain compact form, light enough for an invalid to carry. Courtland begged to be let in on the gift, but the nurse was firm.

"You're doing enough! Wait till you know her better before you try to do any more!"

"Do you think I'll ever know her any better?" laughed Courtland.

"If you have any sense you will!" snapped back the nurse, and waved a grim but pleasant good-by as she took the trolley back to the hospital.

WEDNESDAY night Courtland was on hand with his car in plenty of time to take Bonnie and the nurse down to the station. He was almost startled at the beauty of the girl as she came slowly down the steps. He found himself wanting to turn back often and look again as he drove his car through the crowded evening streets. She looked so frail and sweet he could not help thinking of Mother Marshall and how she would feel when she saw her. Surely she could not help but take her to her heart! He felt a certain pride in her, as if she were his sister. He was half sorry she was going away. He would like to know her better. The words of the nurse, "until you know her better," floated through his mind. What a strange thing that had been for her to say! It wasn't in the least likely that he would ever see Bonnie again.

"She looks as if a breath might blow her away!" said Courtland, speaking out of a troubled thought, as he and the nurse stood on the platform watching the train move off. "Do you think she'll get through the journey all right?"

"Sure!" said the nurse, wiping away a wistful tear furtively. "She's got lots of pep. She'll rally and get strong pretty soon. She's had a pretty tough time the last two years. Lost her mother, father, a sister, and this little brother. Her father's heart was broken by being asked to leave his church because he preached temperance too much. The martyrs in this world didn't all die in the dark ages! They're having them yet!"

"Did it ever seem strange to you that good people have so much trouble in this world?" said Courtland, voicing his same old doubting thought.

"Well, now why! What's trouble going to be in the resurrection? We won't mind then what we passed through, and this world isn't forever, thank the Lord! If it's serving his plan any for me to get more than what seems my share of trouble, why I'm willing. Aren't you? The trouble is we can't see the plan, and so we go fretting because it doesn't fit our ideas. If it was our plan now we'd patiently bear everything, I suppose, to make it come out right. We aren't up high enough to get the whole view of the finished plan, so of course lots of things look like mistakes. But if we trust him at all, we know they aren't. And some time, I suppose, we'll see the whole and then we'll understand why it was. But I never was one to do much fretting because I didn't understand. I always know what my job is, and that's enough. I'm content to trust the rest to God. It's a God-size job to run the universe, and I know I'm not equal to it."

Her simple logic calmed his restless thoughts, but there was still a strange wistfulness in his heart about Bonnie. She looked so white and resigned and sad! He wished she hadn't gone quite so far out of his life.

CHAPTER XXII

UNCLE RAMSEY was large and imposing, with an effulgent complexion and a prosperous presence. He wore a double-jeweled ring on his apoplectic finger, and a scarab scarf-pin. His eyes were keen and shifty; his teeth had acquired the habit of clutching his fat black cigar viciously while he snarled his rather loose lips about them in conversation.

After an exceedingly good dinner at the frat-house, where Tennelly did not usually dine, Uncle Ramsey leaned back in Tennelly's leather chair, and began:

"Now, Thomas!"

Tennelly stirred uneasily. He despised that "Thomas." His full name was Llewellyn Thomas Tennelly. At home they called him "Lew." Nobody but Uncle Ramsey ever dared the hateful Thomas. He liked to air the fact that his nephew was named after himself, the great Ramsey Thomas.

"Suppose you tell me about this man you have for me? What kind of a looking man is he? Has—ah—he—ah—personality! Personality is a great factor in success, you know."

Tennelly, in the brief space allowed him, declared that his friend would pass this test.

"Well—ah! And can he—ah!—can he lead men? Because that is a very important point. The man I want must be a leader."

"I think he is."

"Tell me the worst you know about him, Thomas! What are his faults?" he snapped, and settled back to squint at his imaginary stage again.

"Why—I— Why, I don't think he has any," declared Tennelly, shifting uneasily in his chair. He had a feeling that Uncle Ramsey would get it out of him yet. And he did.

"Yes, I perceive that he has! Out with it!" snapped the keen old bird, flinging his loose lips about restively.

"It's only that he's got a religious twist lately, uncle. I don't think it'll last. I really think he's getting over it!"

"Religion! Um! Ah! Well, now, that might not be so bad—not for my purpose, you know. Religion really gives a confidence sometimes. Religion! Religion! Um! Ah! Not a bad trait. Let me see him, Thomas! Let me see him at once!"

TENNELLY had said nothing to Courtland about the approaching uncle, and therefore it was wholly a surprise to Courtland when Tennelly knocked on his door and dragged him from his books to meet a Chicago uncle.

"He's come East looking for the right man to fill a very important position. It is something along your line, I guess, so I spoke to him about you," whispered Tennelly, hastily, as they crossed the hall together.

Courtland was not afraid of any man, and his natural attitude toward all men was challenge till he knew them. He stood straight and tall and looked Uncle Ramsey in the eye critically, questioningly, courteously, but with no attempt to propitiate; and not the slightest apparent conception of the awesomeness of the occasion or the condescension of the august personage whom he was thus permitted to meet.

And Uncle Ramsey liked it.

Even when the marvelous proposition was made to him which might change the whole course of his future life and cover his name with glory Courtland never flickered an eyelash.

"He took it as calmly as if I'd been offering him toast with his tea when he already had bread and jam, the young whelp!" marveled Uncle Ramsey, delightedly, after Courtland had thanked him, promised to think it over, and gone back to his room. "He's got the personality, all right! He'll do! But what's his idea in being so reluctant? Didn't the offer strike him as big enough, or what's the matter? Has he got something else up his sleeve?"

"Not that I know of," said Tennelly, looking troubled. "I guess he's just got to think it over. That's Court. He never steps into a position until he knows exactly what he thinks about it."

"M-m-m! Another good trait! You're sure it isn't anything else?"

"I don't know of anything unless some of his religious notions are standing in his way. I'm sure I can't quite make him out lately."

"Oh, well, we'll fix him up all right!" said Uncle Ramsey, contentedly. "We'll just send him down to our model factory here in the city and let him see how things are run. Convince him he's doing good, and that 'll settle him! All white marble, with vines over the place, and a big rest-room and reading-room for the hands, gymnasium on the roof, model restaurant, all up to date. Cost a lot of money, too, but it pays! When some whining idiot of a woman, that hasn't enough business of her own to attend to, goes blabbing down there at Washingon about the 'conditions' in the factories, and all that rot, we just run a few senators up here for the day and show 'em that model factory. By the way, there's a little rat of a preacher down around that factory that I'd like to throttle! He's making us all sorts of trouble, stirring up the folks to ask things! He's putting it in their heads to demand an eight-hour day, and no telling how much more! He's undertaken to tell us how we ought to run our business! Tell us which doors we shall lock and which leave unlocked, how often we shall let our hands sit down, and what kind of machines we shall get! He's a regular little rat! Know him? His name's Burns. Insignificant little puppy! And he's got a pull down there in Washington, somehow, that's making us a lot of trouble, too! That's one thing I want this new man for. I want to train him to spy on that sort of interference and by and by do some lobbying. We must stop such business as that."

IF Courtland had tried to explain to Tennelly and his uncle just why this offer, which would have delighted him so much three months before, was hanging in the balance of his mind, they would scarcely have understood. He would have to tell them of the Presence which was by his side, which had been very real to him as he stood in Tennelly's room listening to Uncle Ramsey that afternoon, and which had hovered by him since so close, so strong, with that pervading, commanding nearness that demanded his utmost attention. He would have had to tell them that he was under orders now, being led, and that every step was new and untried; he must look into the face of his Companion and Guide, and find out if this was the way he was to go!

Something, somewhere, was holding him back. He did not know why, he did not see for how long. He simply could not make that decision tonight! He must await permission before moving.

Possibly the trip to the factory the next day, which he had promised to take, might give him some light in the matter. Possibly he would find counsel somewhere. But where? He thought of Gila. He took out a lovely photograph of her that she had given him before he left her Sunday night—a charming, airy, idealistic thing of earth and fire that had lain innocently open upon the library table where some one had left it earlier in the day. He stood it up on his desk and studied the spirited will-o'-the-wisp face! Then he turned away sadly and shook his head. She would not understand. Not yet! Some time, when he had told her about the Presence—but not yet! She could not understand because she had not seen for herself.

TENNELLY and his uncle went downtown in the morning and took lunch togther. Courtland was to meet them at the factory at three o'clock, but somehow he missed them. Perhaps it was intention. Courtland went early. He wanted to see things for himself; went alone first. Afterward he could go the rounds to satisfy Mr. Thomas, but first he would see it alone.

Then, after all, it was the Rev. John Burns who met him at the door and took him through the factory, bent on seeing some parishioner on an errand of love. And there was that strange sense of the Presence having been there before them, walking about among the machinery, looking at the tired face of one, sorrowing over the wrinkles in another forehead, pitying the weary hands that toiled, blessing the faithful! It reminded him of the morgue in that. For a minute he began to think that if the Presence was here in this peculiar sense, then, of course, it was an indication that he was needed here to work for these people, as Uncle Ramsey had tried with strange worldly wisdom to make him understand. But then, suddenly, he caught a glimpse of the face of the little minister, white under its freckles, with a righteous wrath as he fixed his gaze sternly on the door at the end of the long room. He looked up quickly to hear the click of a key in a lock as the foreman passed from one room to another.

He glanced down at the minister and their eyes met.

"They lock them in here like sheep in a pen. If a fire should break out they would all die!" said the minister under his breath. His lips were trembling with the helplessness of himself against the power of a great trust.

"You don't say!" said Courtland, startled. It was his first view of conditions of this sort. He looked about with eyes alive to things he had not seen before. "But I thought this was a model factory! Isn't it absolutely fire-proof?"

"Somewhat so, on the *out*side!" shrugged Burns. "It's a whited sepulcher, that's what it is. Beautiful marble and vines, beautiful rest-room and library—for the visitors to rest and read in—beautiful restaurant where the girls must buy their meals at the company's prices or go without; beautiful outside everywhere; but it's rotten, absolutely rotten all through! Look at the width of that staircase! That's the one the employees use. The visitors only see the broad way by which you came up. Look at those machines! All painted and gilded! They are old models and twice as heavy to work as the new ones. Look at those seats, put there to impress the visitors! The fact is, not one of the hands dare use them, except a minute now and then when the foreman happens to leave the room! They know they will get docked in their pay if they are caught sitting down at their work! And yet it is always flaunted before the visitors that the workmen can sit down when they like. So they can, but they can go home without a pay-envelope if they do, when Saturday night comes. You're interested in these things? I wish you'd let me tell you more some time. About the long hours, the stifling air in some rooms, and the little children working in spite of the law! I wish men like you would come down here and help clean this section out and make conditions different! Why don't you come and help me?"

THE minister laid his hand on Courtland's arm, and instantly it seemed as if the Presence came and stood beside him and said: "Here! This is your work!"

With a great conviction in his heart Courtland followed Burns down the broad marble stairs out to the office, where he left word for Tennelly and his uncle that he had been there and had to go, but would see them again that evening, and then down the street to Burns's common little boarding-house, where they sat down and talked the rest of the afternoon. Burns opened Courtland's eyes to many things that he had not known were in the world. It was as if he had laid his hands upon him and said, as of old:

"Brother Saul, receive thy sight!"

When Courtland went back to the university his decision was made. He felt that he was under orders, and the Presence would not go with him in any such commission as Uncle Ramsey had proposed. His only regret was that Tennelly would not understand. Dear old Tennelly, who had tried to do his best for him!

The dénouement began in Tennelly's room after supper, when Courtland courteously and firmly thanked Uncle Ramsey, but declined the offer!

Uncle Ramsey spluttered and swore. He tore up and down the small confines of the room like an angry bull, bellowing forth anathemas and arguments in a confused jumble. He enlarged on the insult he had been given, and the opportunity that was being lost never to be offered again. He called Courtland a "trifling idiot," and a few other gentle phrases, and demanded reasons for such an unprecedented decision.

Courtland's only answer was: "I am afraid it isn't going to fit in with my views of life, Mr. Thomas."

"Why not? Isn't it enough money?" roared the mad financier. "I'll double your salary!"

"Money has nothing to do with it," said Courtland, quietly.

"Well, have you something else in view?"

"No; not definitely."

"Then you're a fool!" said Uncle Ramsey.

UNCLE RAMSEY blustered all the way to the train with his nephew. "I've got to have that young man, Thomas. There's no two ways about it. A fellow that can stand out the way he did against Ramsey Thomas is just the man I want. He's got personality. Why, a man like that at work for us would be worth millions! He would give confidence to every one! Why, we could make him a senator in a few years, and there's no telling where he wouldn't stop! He's the kind of a man who could be put in the White House if things shaped themselves right. I've got to have him, Thomas, and no mistake! Now, I'm going to put it up to you to find out the secret of this thing. You just get his number and we'll meet him on any reasonable proposition he wants to put up. Say, Thomas, isn't there a girl anywhere that could influence him?"

"Yes, there's a girl!"

"The very thing! You put her wise about it, and when I come back next week I'll stop off again and see what I can do with her? You can take me to call on her, you know. Can you work it, Thomas?"

Tennelly said he'd try, and went around to see Gila on his way back to the university.

Gila listened to the story of Uncle Ramsey's offer with bated breath and averted gaze. She would not show Tennelly how much this meant to her. But in her eyes there grew a determination that was not to be denied.

Long after Tennelly had gone home she stood before her mirror, looking with dreamy eyes into the pictures her imagination drew there for her. She saw herself the bride of Courtland after he had succeeded in the big business enterprise to which Uncle Ramsey had opened the door; she saw Washington with its domes and Capitol looming ahead of her ambition; senators and great men bowing before her; even the White House came like a fantasy of possibility. All this and more were hers if she played her cards aright. Never fear! She would play them! Courtland must be made to accept Uncle Ramsey's proposition!

The Moody Bible Institute's Growth

THE thirty-first annual meeting of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago was held October 19. Mr. Henry P. Crowell, president of the Quaker Oats Company, was reelected president; Mr. E. K. Warren, president of the Warren Featherbone Company, vice-president; and Dr. James M. Gray, secretary. The reports showed a year of increased prosperity. In the educational department there was an enrolment of 1,683 students, of whom the larger number were men; the correspondence department reported 4,831 students, making a total of 6,514. More than twenty foreign nations were represented in the roster. The Institute has done a large work for the churches of Chicago through its evening classes during the past year. In open-air and neighborhood meetings, missions, factories, prisons and hospitals, as well as in the churches and Sunday schools, more than 10,000 persons have professed conversion to Jesus Christ as the result of labors of the students. The extension department of the Institute has also done a large work in the sending out of men and women all over this country and Canada for the conduct of community Bible classes, Bible conferences and evangelistic meetings. It has also carried on a free Christian Workers' Bureau, through which nearly 300 men and women were located in permanent or temporary positions as evangelists, pastors, pastors' assistants, mission workers, etc. The net cost of operating the Institute's work for the year was $186,813.97.

Rev. Harry J. Bright, Cassville, Pa., writes: "I have been a subscriber to the Christian Herald for many years, and am pastor of a circuit in central Pennsylvania. One part of the circuit has been worshiping in a schoolhouse for fifty-seven years. They have forty-nine members, twenty-two of them the result of a gracious revival just closed. We are going to build a church at last, but it will mean a great deal of self-denial on the part of the members. We will dedicate it free from debt."

30 PICTURES THAT TELL BIBLE STORIES

IN one hundred thousand Christian Herald homes our two previous Bible Picture Studies furnished interest and happiness during the long winter evenings. Were you one of those who took part? Whether you were or not, we invite you very cordially to become one of the participants in our new—the third—great Study, which will begin soon, and be a feature of the Christian Herald, and a prized enjoyment in many homes this winter.

Our coming Study—called the

will consist of only 30 pictures—half as many as were required to be solved in each of the two previous competitions! They will be drawn by a well-known artist, and the series will make a notable contribution to Bible illustrations. All 30 pictures will appear in the Christian Herald, one or more each week. Watch for the first picture!

Twice as Much Pleasure

SO the gain in Bible knowledge to those who enter the new Study will be as great as—perhaps greater than, before. Participants will give the pictures more intensive study; they will delight to linger with each one, noting anew each perfect feature, and delving interestedly in the little book of selected Bible verses in search for those that best fit what the pictures show.

Yet the routine work of the Study will be halved, and our own labor in checking the sets of verses will be half as much as before, and therefore done in half the time, too! We intend to make a record in announcing the winners of the Third Study just as rapidly as possible after the sets of verses have been submitted.

Picturing the Beauties of the International Sunday School Lessons

DO you know that the reference book of Bible verses to be used in the new Study will be comprised of verses which have been chosen by the world's greatest Bible scholars—the International Sunday School Lessons and the Daily Home Readings?

Our reference book will be, in fact, an actual reproduction of the Lessons for December, January, February, March and April, with the Daily Home Readings for that period—a total of only about 2,000 Bible verses. From this book participants will choose the best verses for the 30 pictures, write their selections in the Answer Book, and send it in to us. Those who select the best verses for the pictures, according to the decisions of the Committee of Judges, will be awarded the thousands of dollars in cash rewards—and every participant, whether a money prize winner or not, will have the priceless reward of increased Bible knowledge and a greater understanding of the Word of God.

$5,000.00 in Cash Rewards

THE cash rewards will begin with a first prize of $1,000.00 in cash, and grade down to smaller amounts. These rewards are offered to give a concrete incentive to the Study, so that all persons, Bible readers or not, may be led to compete. And in competing we know that even the scoffer will learn wonders, and lead him to realize that the Bible is the home of truth, and the gateway to eternal life.

We have thousands of letters which tell us of the gratifying work performed through our Bible Studies. Back of the interest in competing in it is its great purpose. No one can enter our Study, involving as it does a careful consideration of a number of Bible verses, and come out unaffected by the everlasting message he has found there. Competition can be had without expense by anyone as explained in the rules, which will be published shortly in the Christian Herald, or may be obtained free upon request.

Reserve Your Outfit at Once

THE complete outfit for convenient participation in the great National Bible Picture Study will consist of the Reference List of Bible Verses and the Answer Book, used in conjunction with the 30 pictures, which will appear in the Christian Herald.

Reserve your Outfit now, and make sure that the Christian Herald will come to you without interruption by renewing your subscription to the Christian Herald for one year, sending in simply the regular subscription price for that period, plus only 10 cents additional to cover postage and handling charges—$2.10 in all.

We will then enter your name on our books for a yearly subscription, and mail you the complete Outfit, with rules and all information, just as soon as the books are off the press—which should be very soon. These advance orders will be filled first. Be first to receive your Outfit, and to start fitting verses to the pictures as they appear in the Christian Herald!

A Psalm of Thanksgiving

International Sunday School Lesson for November 25.
Psalm 103

A Song in High C

By Rev. George D. Allison

THERE could be no more appropriate Scripture selection for our study at Thanksgiving time than the 103d Psalm, a pure hymn of gratitude, an exalted poem of praise, a song in high C. For while we may not all be able to reach its heights, it is a challenge to us to know that one man felt like this when he thought on God's goodness, and that millions have echoed its lofty notes in sincerity and joy.

One of the most suggestive little books on this theme is by Cleland B. McAfee, entitled "The Psalms of the Social Life." It is a course of daily readings covering thirteen weeks. Dr. McAfee shows how the psalms fit all moods and experiences, and he rightly describes our lesson as a psalm in the mood of personal exultation.

We do not know who was the author of this treasure of the spirit, but like many other psalms, this is dedicated to King David and may even have come down from his time.

God's Goodness to Us As Individuals

The psalmist is stirring himself up to praise the Lord. He is cultivating the spirit of thanksgiving, and arousing his sluggish soul to worship. We are all prone to prayerlessness and spiritual laxity, and we need the regular stimulus of the appointed means of grace. How often have we gone to church reluctantly, haltingly, and then been brought into a true Sabbath mood as we joined in the great doxology, "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow." How often we have bowed in prayer just because it was prayer time, and then have experienced the welcome and the refreshing of our gracious Heavenly Father!

Particularly on Thanksgiving Day we ought to cultivate personal and national gratitude to God. The psalmist proceeds by remembering the many kinds of blessings he and his nation have received. As the old song has it,

Count your blessings, name them one by one,
And it will surprise you what the Lord hath done.

This is his classification of "benefits":
Forgiveness of sins.
Healing of sickness.
Redemption from death.
Spiritual ministries.
Physical endowments.

He cannot "name them one by one" for they are beyond all counting; but he at least classifies them, and gains a conception of the rounded fulness of God's care for His child. He is no mere sensualist, for he puts forgiving iniquities before healing diseases, and loving kindness and tender mercies before the good things for the body. Many make the mistake of failing to esteem God's choicest blessings because they are in the realm of the untouchables. Many others search for these gifts of the Spirit, but forget that life and health and daily bread are from His hand as well.

God in History

After his meditation on these personal benefits, so many and varied, the singer's mind goes out to the larger reaches of divine ministry. To him all history is a record of God's revelation of his holy will. Always God has been delivering the oppressed and vindicating righteousness among men. Ever the moral order has impinged upon the plans and energies of humanity. The cruel, selfish, despotic forces of the past have always melted away before the breath of the Eternal, as he has lifted his children higher and higher.

Like all the psalms, the 103d uses the deliverance of Israel from Egypt as typical of God's workings in all history. In all their afflictions God was afflicted; He heard their cry and took knowledge of them. He is the Father of nations as well as of men. He who had compassion upon the brickmakers of Pharaoh and made them a strong people is mindful of the sorrows of stricken Belgium in these days of turmoil and strife. He who pitied fallen Jerusalem and brought back the exiles of Babylon yearns over ravaged Armenia and ruined Poland, and seeks his Moses and his Nehemiah to lead them out and to build them up once more.

Be thankful, in this dark year of war, that God rules and that his hand is on the helm of the universe. He will yet execute righteousness and justice for all that are oppressed. From the blood of today's martyrs in the cause of human freedom there shall spring up a new and more glorious conception of the meaning of life. For we are fighting this war on our way upward toward internationalism and world brotherhood, not, as some fear, on our way downward to anarchy and ruin.

Be thankful that the great free Christian peoples are rising from their materialism and selfishness to sublime sacrifice and service at the call of the God of righteousness.

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgment seat;
O be swift, my soul, to answer him, be jubilant,
my feet,
Our God is marching on.

Be thankful that the God who inspired the men of 1861 to "die to make men free," gives us the privilege of fighting and dying if need be to make the world free.

God's Forgiveness of Sin

Moving out on the current of song from the remembrance of personal blessings into the national thanksgiving memorial of the Exodus, our psalmist now chants the praises of the magnanimous and patient Jehovah. How gracious God is, how "long-suffering toward us," how abundant in loving kindness! If God dealt with men in severity and vengeance, who should achieve spiritual success? But in forgiving love he leads us on, ever upward, saying only, "Put your hand in mine, my way is best." Thanksgiving Day ought to be a Day of Forgiveness, if we have aught against any, since God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us.

God's Eternity and Man's Transitoriness

The thought of God's gentleness in dealing with man leads to a little stanza in a minor key which swells out at the end to a heartfelt C major. Man is the transient grass, the ephemeral flower, easily obliterated, soon forgotten. "But the loving kindness of Jehovah is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear Him, and His righteousness unto children's children." How glorious is that sweep of infinite love that gathers up the children of a day into the arms of eternal fatherhood! With all our weakness, our little brief earthly career, we are heirs of immortality, because God hath loved us with an everlasting love.

The Closing Doxology

So after this solemn note of warning he swings into one of those marvelous doxologies that characterize these Hebrew hymns. He launches forth the idea of God's kingdom in all its assured power and universal authority. He calls upon the celestial forces, "heroes of strength," to testify for their Creator. He summons the hosts of angels from the empyrean to echo the song of praise. He calls upon the sun and moon and stars throughout the mighty reaches of the universe to swell the chorus. And then he calls upon his spiritual nature to add its mite to the oratorio of thanksgiving that rings from heaven to earth. "Bless the Lord, O my soul!"

Teachers' Outline

To study such a psalm seems like dissecting a lily, and to praise it is much like painting one. Steep yourself in appreciation of its beauty and its message, and read it aloud with all the expression you can put into it. Then analyze it on the blackboard.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Thanksgiving Sunday, November 25

ABOVE all other years, this coming Thanksgiving Sunday should be celebrated by our Sunday schools as a Thanks and a Giving Sunday.

We should give thanks for our great harvests, not because we are to be fed even if others starve, but because, as trustees for those who have nothing, we have the privilege of sharing with them our plenty. This makes necessary on this Thanksgiving Day that we emphasize the note of self-denial for the sake of others, and especially for the children of Belgium and Armenia and Syria, and for the soldiers.

In order to prepare adequately for the day, I would make the following suggestions:

1. Obtain from your local newspaper or from the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, the facts as to the year's harvests. Have these facts tabulated on a blackboard.

2. Secure from the National Food Conservation Bureau, Washington, or from the local newspaper, suggestions as to ways in which folks can conserve the food supply to help make up Europe's shortage. Have some one read the best and most practical of these suggestions. The government has called upon the Sunday schools to give special help in this food conservation work.

3. Many schools have appointed a correspondent for each soldier who is a school member and away at camp. A week before Thanksgiving, these correspondents, or the superintendent or teacher, should write a special Thanksgiving letter to the boy.

4. Thanksgiving Sunday is a good time to unveil a tablet or roll of the soldier boys who have gone from the church or school. Many schools have prepared temporary rolls. These should be replaced by permanent rolls of honor to be placed in a prominent position. In the Sixth United Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, there is a wooden tablet, six feet long. At the top are the words "Called to the Colors." There are two columns of names in gilt letters on a black background. A more elaborate plan is a bronze tablet, with each soldier's name cast in bronze.

5. Thanksgiving Sunday is a good time to announce that all Protestant Sunday schools and churches are asked to prepare a monthly Christmas offering for the suffering and fatherless Armenian and Syrian children.

6. While thinking and planning for these needs away from home, the children should be encouraged to send Thanksgiving letters or postals to the children of some orphanage or to the children's ward of some hospital.

7. The usual plan will be followed of inviting actual gifts of produce from all.

8. Secure, for reading, a copy of the President's Thanksgiving Proclamation.

9. These suggestions, with the usual Thanksgiving musical selections, will furnish the program material. The story of the Pilgrim Fathers will, of course, be read: but the main emphasis should be on ways by which the descendants of these "Fathers" are doing their duty today by their country and the world.

New York Celebrates the Reformation

THE Four Hundredth Reformation Anniversary passed out in a burst of glory in the culminating mass meeting at Carnegie Hall, New York City, the evening of October 31. It was the only mass meeting of national significance and character. It was a civic meeting, bringing to the forefront the wider influence of the Reformation on the progress of civilization.

The representation was in keeping with the general interest roused by the anniversary. The great universities, seminaries and colleges sent delegates. Religious, civic and educational associations were appropriately represented. Many of the public officials of the City of New York, including the Mayor, either were present themselves or showed their interest by sending representatives. Edward Schoeneck, Lieutenant-Governor of New York, appeared for Governor Whitman and expressed his happiness that New York State was honored with having so significant a meeting. Dr. A. G. Lawson, chairman of the administrative committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, brought the felicitations of that body.

The meeting assumed an international aspect through the presence of Messrs. V. Monod and G. Lauga, who had come from the Huguenot churches of France. They read a message reaffirming the faith of the Huguenots in the principles of the Reformation.

The center of the decoration scheme was a heroic-size bust of Martin Luther surrounded by palms. The bust was made by the well-known sculptor C. Keck and, standing out in pure white from its background of green, it made a remarkable impression.

THE speakers were in keeping with the significance of the occasion. Mr. George D. Boschen, chairman of the New York Reformation Anniversary Committee, the chairman, in his opening remarks, indicated the special purpose of the gathering. "We are met here tonight particularly to emphasize the influence of the Reformation on the civic and educational life of our nation—that we may have a nobler sense of Christian citizenship, and be spurred on with renewed zeal and fresh enthusiasm to render to our state and nation new service and loyal support."

Dr. J. A. Singmaster, president of Gettysburg Seminary, the first speaker, took for his topic, "Luther, the Man of Centuries." He showed the remarkable combination of qualities in Luther that went to make him the founder of modern life. "Luther was genius set on fire by the Holy Ghost. His superb attainments made him a leader of men. His deep personal religious experience gave him a knowledge of sin and of its remedy. His sound judgment enabled him to avoid the snares and errors which would have been fatal to his work. His conservative temper saved what was good and beautiful. His manly virtues of reality, unselfishness and courage revealed the grandeur of his personality."

The most thoughtful address of the evening was delivered by Dr. P. P. Claxton, National Commissioner of Education. He spoke on the intellectual significance of the Reformation. In the first part, he pointed out Luther's clean-cut stand for education, high and low. "Our interest is not in the past but in the present and future," he said. "We want to know what Luther would say and do amid the problems of today." Sketching the problems confronting this nation, he held that the result of the war would place America at the center of the world's interest. Until recently practically alone as a democracy, after the war it would be the oldest democracy of any and become their guide and teacher. Three years ago a debtor nation to Europe, now it possessed the wealth of the world. "With tasks and responsibilities multiplying a thousandfold, we must prepare for the duties that are before us." Then, dramatically turning to the white, solemn bust of Luther towering above him, the speaker said: "We need the spirit of Martin Luther to guide us and inspire us for the work before us. We must carry out more fully the work of education he began."

Hon. Martin Grove Brumbaugh was the final speaker. He spoke in popular strain, and roused the great audience that packed the hall to renewed enthusiasm. He spoke on the political significance of the Reformation.

A PROGRAM of Reformation music was rendered by mass choir and orchestra under the direction of the well-known composer, Mr. E. Schmauk. Madame Johanna Gadski sang a number of solos, among them "A Mighty Fortress is our God." In the second verse the assembly rose and joined, making the hall vibrate with the massive measures of the battle-hymn of the Reformation. Dr. Claxton remarked that for the first time he realized what Carlyle meant, when he said of the hymn that it moves along like a granite mountain.

The New York Reformation Quadricentenary Committee, under whose auspices the meeting was held, will publish the speeches and program of this climax of the fourth Reformation Centennial as a souvenir of the anniversary.

Adventures in Neighboring

An Exchange of Experiences between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Who Are Putting Them into Practice

AND now the first hints of winter are in the air: a bracing tang; a snow particle or two; a biting little wind that hurries us, laughing, along the village street, or reddens our hands and cheeks as we crank the machine on a farm road.

For it is early winter, and we are more joyously alive than we have been since the first wave of summer heat swept through the streets or across the great prairie or into the foothill valley we call home.

Gone is summer, with its heat and stress of work; gone the fall: that time of plans and preparation. Winter is here. We can smell and feel it! And unlike the house cat, who—all drawn into a shivering bundle—ventures out gingerly into the keen air, only to hasten back with dignified disgust, we welcome the air's sharp thrust.

Laughing and chattering, we harness up, or crank up, and—with cheeks tingling and spirits soaring—start off for an afternoon's neighboring.

And as we drive along—with son or small sister, or grandmother, or "Uncle John" (wrapped like a cocoon)—tucked cosily in beside us, we realize how dearly we love country life and especially our own little corner of it; and we wonder how we could ever have dreaded the monotony of the coming winter.

Monotonous? It is not going to be that this year, whatever it was last! For, since last winter, we have grown an eighth sense: the community sense. And all during the fall we have been planning: quietly planning.

EVERY one is included in our hopes, if not in our immediate plans. Our young people really should have a music club; the little boys a gymnasium; the married women a Literary Forum; the men something to get them out of the rut occasionally; and the old people an organization all their own. Besides, there should be larger things afoot: doings that shall weld together, if only for a day, all the men, women and children in the neighborhood. A community concert might do, or a Christmas Tree, or a Soldiers' and Sailors' Day. (Ah, that would touch the lives and hearts of every one!) And then—our community needs a free library, and a modern hall in which the clubs can meet, and—and——

And so, as we drive along, the plans seethe. It may be that before the day is over we shall have run across enough opposition and disbelief and derision to discourage anybody but a plucky country woman with a high ideal and a real love for her neighbors. (She is the hardest thing in God's outdoors to dishearten!)

But there is one thing we can all take comfort in: practically every rural woman (indeed, every human being) who has ever had an innovation to propose has met with opposition at first. But this has only made the effort doubly worth while. So let us keep at it! The community on which we lavish unselfish effort will sooner or later appreciate our vision and untiring labor.

HERE is a letter, for instance, which is like a ringing challenge to all rural mothers and school-teachers. Its writer has headed it:

Music in Our Rural Schools

If the people of any rural community wish to add to the interest and value of the school, let them assist the teacher in securing a phonograph and a good selection of records.

In my small town, the teacher of our district asked my assistance in this matter. A subscription paper was taken to every house, whether the people had children in the school or not. For it was felt that this was a community affair.

The response was very generous, the total being enough to buy a small but good machine of standard make. We then planned an entertainment, to be given by the children. A small admission was charged; and cake, ice-cream, and candy were on sale. This proved to be a very successful affair financially, and very enjoyable as a community gathering. With the proceeds a fine selection of records was purchased. This was two years ago. Each year two such gatherings are held, to secure funds for new records.

Rural teachers are not always proficient in music. Rural children have few chances to hear good music. A phonograph opens before them the best music of the world: orchestral, instrumental, band, and vocal.

Records may be found to suit all grades, from the primary to the highest. If any school has not yet had the privilege of marching in and out to inspiring marches played by the best bands; of hearing fine music as a part of the opening exercises and Friday programs; of hearing patriotic music sung correctly—in fact, of cultivating a taste for good music—it lies with the people of the community to remedy this. And almost any community stands ready to do it, if some individual will get the thing started.

FROM this valuable "adventure in neighboring" we are going to jump to one which may seem, at first glance, a mere instance of that personal neighboring—that extending of hospitality or kindness to dear friends—which has not, rightfully, a place in this department, since this column is dedicated to that larger, broader neighboring which is another word for community service. But the difference is this: the guests at this unique Thanksgiving dinner were not dear friends or even acquaintances. However, the letter shall speak for itself! It is from Kansas; and its warm-hearted writer has entitled it:

Extending the Spirit of Hospitality

Five years ago we found ourselves located in a new community far from kindred and friends: pilgrims in a strange land.

Thanksgiving Day was drawing near. We had met but few of the people of the neighborhood. But we did not see how we could fittingly observe Thanksgiving Day alone.

I began to think. There were the Browns, who had just settled, over at the Ridge, only a few miles away. They, too, were alone, separated from relatives, without friends as yet. Then there were the Judsons. They had been there a year, but were so reticent they had made but little progress in getting acquainted. I knew they were pining for friendship. Why shouldn't we invite these two families of strangers over, and have a good time? It seemed foolish to kill a turkey and make cranberry sauce and pumpkin pie just for us three! My husband and son agreed to my plans, and so I did the inviting, including —besides the two families—a lone bachelor across the fields.

The dinner was just an ordinary Thanksgiving Day repast of minor importance in this account, though seemingly much enjoyed.

But it is of the associations formed, of the happiness that resulted from that one day's gathering, that I wish to speak. It was the beginning of neighborly good will that has never ended, as well as of a neighborhood custom we still observe.

Each recurring Thanksgiving Day finds us meeting again to enjoy together the good things of life and to offer thanks for God's graciousness and mercy. And we try to include in our dinner all the strangers, the lonely and the bereaved in the neighborhood. Thus it is not unusual for us to have several guests of honor on these occasions.

Not often can space be given to a letter of just this type, beautiful as it is. But I felt that right now, when the season of Thanksgiving is so close at hand, when our sense of hospitality is so occupied with thoughts of brothers, cousins, aunts and uncles, or of dear friends, this letter might remind some of us of the "stranger within our gates:" the lonely neighbor who has no claim on us but who hungers for our hospitality.

IF the department, this week, has carried a worth-while hint, or even a word of encouragement to its readers, won't you, in your turn, sit down now and send in (just as, in returning a neighbor's dish, you would fill it with something good) your own helpful experiences for the benefit of these "neighbors" in other states?

And especially won't you (if you can get your accounts to me before December first) send me facts about your community at Christmas time: how it celebrates Christmas, what are the costs of the celebration, and whether or not it is all worth while?

Meantime: watch next week's "Adventures in Neighboring" for a letter which you cannot afford to miss.

VERA L. CONNOLLY.

FRANK G. CARPENTER

IN every Chautauqua Association and in nearly every town and village of the United States, Frank G. Carpenter is known as the man who can come back from some place and then tell about it so that you think you have been there. After going into all the odd corners of the world, Mr. Carpenter has now turned his steps toward the farms and factories of his native land. Already he has told stories in the Christian Herald of steel and cotton, of sugar and of sulphur, of oil and lumber, and he has only just made a beginning. This exceedingly interesting series of articles, under the title of the

GREATER UNITED STATES

appears regularly in the

CHRISTIAN HERALD

Mr. Carpenter is making studies of our farms, factories, and mines from the standpoint of efficiency and industrial preparedness, and will make careful investigations of the wealth and resources of the United States, telling in the Christian Herald how they may be mobilized in times of need.

The aim of these travels is to learn just what we have in resources and industry, and how they may be protected, developed, and made most efficient for the American people.

Mr. Carpenter is making extensive travels throughout the United States, covering the great agricultural and industrial centers. He is taking up the great industries and is showing the new things that are taking place in them, especially drugs, dyes, etc. These articles deal with New England, with the newest South with its iron and sulphur, cotton and chemicals, and with the bread and meat lands of the Mississippi Valley. He will show what is going on in and about the Great Lakes, including the vast iron mines on which our manufacturing industry is founded.

Mr. Carpenter will visit and tell about the fast-growing Southwest, the Northwest and the Pacific Slope.

WHY 300,000 FAMILIES LOVE CHRISTIAN HERALD

THE Christian Herald is doing something more than merely placing interesting reading matter in the homes of its readers. It is giving them a part in great enterprises. It is giving them spiritual and material helpfulness. It is the one magazine that represents in the most vital way all of the interests of Protestant Christianity and of the on-marching church of Christ. Week by week, the Christian Herald is giving its readers issues of absorbing interest.

You should be a regular reader of the Christian Herald and enjoy these special features which are now appearing:

Questions and Answers

REV. A. P. WILLIS, Midland, Texas. My father was a subscriber to the Christian Herald when I was a mere boy, and he continued to take it until he was called to his reward. And ever since having a family of my own, it has been a regular visitor. I have been in the Presbyterian ministry since 1888, and in pioneer mission work since 1897, working in West Texas and New Mexico. I have seen the time during my mission work when I had to part company with our denominational publications, for financial reasons; but during all these years the Herald has been in the home. I have ofttimes stated that as a power for righteousness the Herald was second to no publication in America. Its possibilities as well as responsibilities are very great; yet for a number of years I have felt that the public was not heard from as often as it might be. Some of our very best talent is in the laity, so why not let them "speak out in meeting" occasionally? As I view it, there never was a more opportune time than just now. What or where was the religious weakness that brought on the present world-war? As I view it, no devout Christian can believe that the teachings of Christ, applied to the nation the same as to the individual, would ever do it, but, instead, would bring about a world brotherhood. In view of the fact that it is possible for the war to end as suddenly as it began, would it not be well to take up this subject at once, and especially as the United States has been involved in it? As followers of the Christ, we cannot afford to have it occur again, so let's discuss these questions: Where was the weak point? How to prevent it occurring again?

Pastor Willis's suggestion is especially timely, and the more so in view of the fact that the whole subject has been thrown open by the Religious Congress which recently met in Pittsburg, Pa. That body of 500 ministers and religious teachers, representing practically all the Protestant denominations, went on record as declaring the question of the church's responsibility the greatest that is before Christendom at the present time. An account of the Congress appears elsewhere in this issue. We shall be glad to have our friends read it, and thereafter send us their views on the subject, as Pastor Willis suggests.

H. P. P., Titusville, N. J. He was a wise philosopher who said that it is useless to lament conditions over which we have no control, and which we are powerless to change.

R. M. B., Gunnison, Colo. It is one thing to believe in the Scriptural statements concerning the Second Coming, and quite another to assume to fix a date. Many over-zealous students of prophecy have foundered on the rock of presumption. It is folly for man to assert knowledge of that which God in his wisdom has withheld, to be disclosed in his own good time. It is well to be on guard against false prophets and misleading teachers.

J. L. H., Alaska. I have charge of the mission work among the natives at this village. Mission work has been carried on among them for about thirty-five years. The work done both by the mission and by the Bureau of Education has been to make them dependent rather than independent. Their greatest interest is in those who "help them." This is good, but it is only half of real Christianity. They seem not to think of helping some one else. I am anxious to know where literature can be secured that sets forth in vivid pictures or terms the needs of other peoples, bodily and spiritually.

The Bible tells us that "there is that scattereth and yet increaseth." The spirit of helpfulness, once kindled, will keep on growing with each new experience. Tell your people how the poor orphan children of China (at Fukien Orphanage and other places) are sending their gifts—saved by denying themselves a meal occasionally—to the relief organizations to help save the starving children of Europe. Half the world is suffering from hunger today—not Europe alone, but a large part of Asia as well. Our American Committees have sent vast amounts of relief these three years past, and are still sending. Tell these facts to your people and they may be stirred to a little self-denial, that they may have a share in this life-saving work. Tell them that the Lord loves a cheerful giver, and that they will never be the poorer for it.

Mrs. R. C. Davis, 12193 Brook St., Louisville, would be glad to have some reader of this paper send her a copy of the poem, "Gone Home by a Shorter Way," the opening line of of which is, "His brief life-work is ended."

G. D. D., Hampton, N. H. It has been announced by the authorities in Washington that only current issues of publications will be accepted for forwarding to our soldier boys. No back numbers of any kind—daily, weekly or monthly—will be received.

T. T. B., Newark, N. J. An old Bible is usually associated with so many tender memories that one feels reluctant to part with it. Worn with much usage it may be, and even faded, so that it is read with difficulty; yet we remember how the dear old hands of a father or mother held it, and how many times they would seek it in days of heavy trial, when consolation was needed. It may be that the old Bible, frayed and shabby now with much wear, has been made the means of opening up a vision of the new life to many an inquiring and anxious one, for God's Word is a lamp to the feet and a light to the path. It is one of the greatest of soul-winners. Those spots on its old covers may mark where tears of repentance dropped and dried; or they may have been tears of joy at finding in its pages the way to peace and forgiveness. If it be—as it most likely is—the old Authorized Version, then it is still the grandest example of living literature extant, a source of inspiration to more famous men and women than any other book ever printed. If it be so worn that you don't use it yourself, it may still serve for some poor neighbor who has no Bible of her own. If not, then you can still give it a place on your shelves, even if you should get yourself a new one with clearer type for home or church—such a Bible as the Christian Herald furnishes to thousands of its readers every year.

R. W. F. The objections to marriage with a deceased husband's brother, or a deceased wife's sister, are founded on Lev. 18 : 18 and 20 : 22, from which it appears that brothers and sisters-in-law are included in the proscribed degrees of consanguinity. These considerations led States and countries to proscribe such marriages.

Rev. L. C. G., Damascus, Ga. To answer your questions fully would take more space than we can give here. There is no conflict between Rom. 5 : 18; 8 : 15, and Matt. 19 : 14. How original sin is regarded theologically is indicated in John 3 : 5–6, and Rom. 5 : 12. But Christ came to help and save all sinners, and to remove the stain of those who accept him as Saviour and follow his teaching.

Farmer's Wife, Morrisonville, N. Y. I feel I must tell you how much I appreciate your editorial of a recent issue on "Farmers." In this day and age, the press in general seems to be intent on abusing the farmer, just because he wants a decent living. You know, when we look at our "city cousin" and see that he works only eight hours a day—and not very hard labor at that, compared to farming—and enjoys all the comforts of city life, we cannot forget that we work from twelve to sixteen hours, at the very hardest kind of work, and go without all comforts, you might say. Some say the farmer only works in summer, but that is a false statement, on this farm at least, for my husband works long hours in winter, and last winter sorted potatoes many an evening. I am thoroughly enjoying the new serial, "The Witness." Think it is the very best story I ever read.

Every one knows that the farmers, as a class, are hard workers with long hours. Imagine what effect an eight-hour day among farmers generally would have on the nation's food supply. But it is equally true that the agricultural life has its compensations, fresh, wholesome, unadulterated food being by no means the least of them. Besides, the farmer is today more than ever in the public eye, for upon the agricultural productivity of the class to which he belongs not only our own nation but many others are depending to make up the food shortage caused by the war.

The Lord's Money

THE following letter, which comes to us anonymously from Lavaca, Ark., enclosing a check for $100, is one that deserves to be widely read, conveying as it does a very personal sense of individual responsibility for the conscientious use of our material blessings:

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City: At a missionary meeting I attended, one of the posters bore these words: 'How much of the Lord's money do you use for Him?' It made a great impression on me. My parents had been generous in their giving, and now I am nearing the sixty-year mark and I hope my children and grandchildren will follow in our footsteps. The enclosed check is the Lord's money, to be applied to the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of the War."

Bible Students and Christian Workers

Do you know your Bible? Do you feel the need of a more thorough, practical working knowledge of the Word of God? Are you awake to the means of securing it economically while engaged in your usual occupation? This means is by correspondence.

Correspondence Bible Study

For all unable to attend a Bible Institute, correspondence Bible study is a practical, efficient and economical method of securing a deeper, clearer knowledge of the Bible. A Tennessee student writes:—"What marvelous light I have received through these lessons! Long, long years I pondered over things in the precious Book that I now understand." You will become just as enthusiastic as soon as you start your first course. We cannot urge too strongly all who wish a more thorough knowledge of God's Word to take up the work with us now.

The Moody Bible Institute

offers eight strong courses for systematic Bible study by correspondence. It has a fully equipped department, exclusively devoted to teaching by correspondence. You will be instructed by competent, practical Christian teachers. Over 5000 students in all parts of the world last year studied one or more of our courses. Thousands of Christian people will this year begin correspondence study for the first time. Will you be one of them?

AWAKENING SONGS

Is the Winning Title for the New Rodeheaver Song Book

(Former Title "Gospel Hymns and Songs.")

Our offer of $25.00 cash or one hundred cloth bound song books for a winning title for our new gospel song book brought forth thousands of suggestions and from these we have selected the title Awakening Songs.

Strangely enough, this title was suggested by but one person — Rev. Gustav Mathisen, pastor of Bethel Norwegian-Danish M. E. Church, E. 72nd St., Chicago.

However, we feel deeply obligated to all who favored us by making suggestions and we now offer to every one who sent in a suggestion:

On one cash order for any quantity of Awakening Songs in any of the bindings, ten per cent. discount from the regular list prices, which are, in quantities: Cloth 25c per copy, Limp cloth 18c per copy, Manila 15c per copy, not prepaid.

This Offer Expires February 1, 1918

We thank all our friends for their helpful suggestions and trust they will all avail themselves of this low-price offer, which is unusually generous now when war conditions are putting the cost of book making way up. Unless these conditions soon change, we will have to fall in line and increase the price of song books in keeping with the increased cost of production.

Help Our Boys at the Front

ON ACTIVE SERVICE
With the
AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

AMERICAN
Y. M. C. A.

September 19, 1917.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I have been transferred from El Paso, Texas (Fort Bliss), to France. Will you please change the address on my paper to that given below.

Our Soldier Boys read the Christian Herald with great delight. It is the only religious paper the boys read to any extent. I have five copies on hand now and they are nearly worn out and still they are being read every day.

Those five are old ones sent by friends in America unknown to me. They are the only ones we have had since I opened up here.

Will you put us on your gratuitous subscription list that the Sammies may have the Christian Herald each week? If you don't care to do this perhaps you can give me a hint as to who to write to get them to help supply the boys.

You would be surprised to know how few magazines we get. We must do something to get reading matter for them this Winter.

Can you help me in any way? I shall hope to hear from you and anything that you can do for us will be appreciated.

I have charge of two Y. M. C. A. Huts. Each hut is 40 x 100 feet in size. They are 1½ miles apart and every night till "Taps" sound are just packed with soldiers. We try to keep them busy and keep them pleasantly entertained, but we are a long distance from supplies. My mail is sent to me direct from Paris.

Yours sincerely,

31 Ave. Montaigue,
Paris, France.

Dr. James M. Gray

Your Boy—Your Brother Your Friend

Will Soon Be in the Training Camps of Europe

Prof. E. O. Sellers, a member of the faculty of the Moody Bible Institute, was one of the six men invited by the British National Council of the Y M. C. A. to make a tour of the training camps in France and England. He spent several months in those two countries, doing evangelistic work and taking part in the activities of the Y. M. C. A. He was also in London during an air raid. He tells a great story of his experiences and also of the wonderful work being done among the soldiers and prisoners of war by the Y. M. C. A., which is an inspiration in itself. Being an able writer, Prof. Sellers knows how to tell what he has seen and describes in a vivid manner the conditions into which our chaps are going. The story of his experiences will be told in a series of articles to appear exclusively in the Christian Workers' Magazine, so that every one may quickly become familiar with the Christian work that is being done among the soldiers in Europe.

There also appear in The Christian Workers Magazine illustrated articles by Mrs. Ralph C. Norton on "Work Among the Belgian Soldiers," and Mrs. Ada Wallace Unruh on "The Soldiers and Moral Restraints." Beginning in December will be another collection of touching articles from the pen of F. C. Hoggarth of Huddlesfield, England, entitled "Short Studies on War Incidents."

Dr. James M. Gray writes regularly for The Christian Workers Magazine. He is known the world over as one of the leading writers on prophecy, and during the next year his articles will be of unusual importance to Christian people.

God's Call to the Christian in Regard to the War

What is the Christian's duty in the world war? Why are wars dreaded and hated as they are? Is God the author of war? Is war a consequence of sin? Is war a divine punishment for sin? What about the Christian who has conscientious scruples concerning war? These questions are clearly answered in a recent lecture entitled—

"What The Bible Teaches About War"

AND THE CHRISTIAN'S ATTITUDE IN THE PRESENT CRISIS

By Dr. James M. Gray, Editor of The Christian Workers Magazine

In response to many inquiries received by Dr. Gray regarding these questions, this lecture is an attempt to answer these numerous inquiries as to the Christian's relation to war in the light of prophecy. Thousands of people have anxiously waited for this lecture, which is now published in booklet form and will be sent free to all that send in the coupon; also we will send you free booklet containing the remarkable lecture

THE BATTLE OF ARMAGEDDON

By Dr. James M. Gray

This lecture answers the question regarding the great war and its relation to the battle of Armageddon mentioned in the Book of Revelation; also its relation to the end of the age or the second coming of Christ. Thousands of copies of this lecture have been distributed, and only a limited supply is left.

How to Be Strong -and Well

DON'T accept ill-health, low spirits, excessive flesh or unnatural thinness as a permanent affliction. The most stubborn ailment, nine times in ten, can be overcome, and any woman can be made to weigh exactly what she should — easily, quickly, inexpensively — without drugs—all in the privacy of her room.

That's a broad claim. But I can prove it. I have reduced 40,000 of the most cultured women and built up as many more, in the privacy of their rooms —scientifically—

Without Drugs

I will send you letters of endorsement from eminent physicians and tell you how I would treat you.

Physicians endorse my work — their wives and daughters are my pupils.

Don't let writing a letter stand between you and GOOD HEALTH, ANIMATION, Correct Weight and a Perfect Figure. Write me now—today—while this subject is uppermost. Tell me in confidence, whether you suffer from any of the ailments listed here, and I will tell you how I can help you.

If you have any of the following derangements, run a line through it and send it to me:

Excess Flesh in any part of body
Thin Bust, Chest, Neck or Arms
Round Shoulders
Incorrect Standing
Incorrect Walking
Poor Complexion
Poor Circulation
Lame Back
Sleeplessness
Lack of Reserve
Nervousness

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

"IN the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand." Morning prayer is a seed-sowing that brings blessed fruit ere evening shadows mark the closing day. The heart is free, the mind is clear, the tranquillity of the dawn is in the soul, as yet undisturbed by the trials and vexations and temptations of the day. Even as the upthrown shade opens the house to the light of sunrise, so the opening of the Book opens the heart to the Light of Life. A few minutes spent in prayerful contemplation of the Word and in spiritual communion with God will be seeds of strength and power that will fortify the soul against the turmoil of the day and give the spirit conquering might.

Such a day, well begun, ends well. But if we rush from sleep to toil with no thought of God or his Word, our own little strength will fail time after time, and the day will be marked by ruptured tempers, defaulted opportunities, compromised friendships and lost business. If we come home at night peevish, churlish, tired of life and out of sorts with the world, we are only reaping the crop of our morning's forgetfulness. The Word has power even then to comfort and give hope; but why not take in power at sunrise?

Mrs. B. L. D., who had suffered from a complication of ailments that had completely baffled medical science, thanks God for bodily healing, but especially for the great spiritual uplift that came to her as a result of the prayers of her Christian friends. She asks for further prayer to fortify both body and spirit.

B. M., of London, England, asks prayer for protection in the daily and nightly menace of the air raids, especially for a daughter, who must go out daily. Even as this letter is being written, the writer says, "There go the guns again."

Mrs. C. W. F., on becoming a member of the Prayer League, asks all the members to join in prayer for the grief-stricken of the earth, and that the time may soon come when the nations will not learn to war, but to enjoy His presence. She also asks when the President wishes the nation to join in united prayer for the success of our arms. It was October 28.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Howe Cave, N. Y. (that revival may be blessed, and that Schoharie County may be voted dry); Roanoke, Ala. (for a great revival.)

His Mother, Mrs. M. A. B., Mrs. C. M. C., and A Mother ask prayer that their sons' minds, Mrs. O. D., that father's mind may be restored; Mrs. N. W., that brother's and son-in-law's minds may be restored; eleven friends, for mental restoration for themselves, relatives or friends.

M. W. C. asks prayer that son's sight, A Reader, that mother's sight may be restored; eight friends, that sight may be restored for themselves, relatives or friends.

Five friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing.

Six friends ask prayer for special blessings for others.

Twenty-six friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Four parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; I. H. E., that a friend may be cured of the liquor habit.

Thirty-three friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives; thirty-one friends, for healing of themselves, including L. C., to be cured of cancer; Mrs. C. A. W., that health may be restored without an operation; A. T. C., that I may regain the use of limbs.

Sixteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including R. W. C., that three sons may be saved; five wives, their husbands; twenty-five, other relatives and friends.

Eighteen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Forty-three friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including nine friends who ask prayer for worldwide peace; another, Mrs. S. H. S., that bill for the widow's pension may be passed.

A friend asks prayer that church troubles may be removed.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following: A Reader, Byrdton, Va.; B., New Haven, Conn.; A Believer, Pinewood, S. C.; Mrs. H. M. W., Fayetteville, Ark.; M. A., Hillsboro, Iowa; S. L., Sutherland, Neb.; H. S. F., Lakeside, Calif.; Mrs. M. B. W., Fairmont, Okla.; E. E. M., Long Beach, Calif.; Mrs. R. M. K., Delhi, Kan.; M. W. C., Du Bois, Pa.; A Member, Brandon, Fla.

Counting Our Blessings

Epworth League Topic. Ps. 139 : 17-18; 103 : 1-5

"COUNT your many blessings, count them one by one." We sing it and the very singing makes us happier; but if we would begin counting we would be happier still. Sometimes we say we have nothing to be thankful for and we begin to enumerate our disappointments and trials and sorrows of greater or less degree; but after the sum is all taken it is less than the total of our blessings. Some poet has said that he always wears his clouds wrong side out to show the silver lining, and if we will turn our cloud of trouble inside out, we will find in the silver lining much value to add to the total of our blessings. With our country at war, some of us may be thankful that we are given an opportunity to take an active part either as soldiers or in the Red Cross, or in some other station where our work counts either for the flag or for the comfort of those who fight for it. There never was a time when one's life could count for as much as in the present. This is in itself a blessing untold. If sacrifice appears to be your portion, thank God for that. In sacrifice and service you will find the twin blessings which make your Thanksgiving this year a regal feast.

For What Am I Grateful?

Christian Endeavor Topic. Ps. 34 : 1-22

This topic was covered as a B. Y. P. U. topic in last week's Christian Herald.

Our Responsibility in Central America

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Romans 10 : 1-4

AS the great republic of the North, the United States has been to South America and Central America both a model to be followed and a giant to be feared. With liberties patterned after ours, the people of these republics nevertheless feared our financial and political power, and all too many of the North Americans went to the republics of the South merely to exploit them. One of the fundamentals of liberty, however, is liberty of conscience, without which political liberty is of little value. Another fundamental is education, without which forms of liberty quickly become shackles of tyranny. Central America has been somewhat overlooked in the sending of missionaries to the South. She needs the pure Gospel and she needs education. Conditions in the different countries vary somewhat. Information as to the exact situation and as to the work of the Baptist Church in this region can be secured by addressing Rev. John M. Moore, 23 East 26th Street, New York City.

REV. PAUL RADER and Rev. Melvin Trotter, who directed the annual camp meeting at Ocean Grove during its 1917 session, are both energetic evangelistic workers in Chicago. Mr. Rader is pastor of the Moody Church, which was founded by Dwight L. Moody, and is bravely carrying on the work of its founder. Mr. Trotter is superintendent of the Pacific Garden Mission, in which both he and Billy Sunday were converted, and he has a chain of rescue missions in the large cities of the country.

Questions and Answers

R. R. J., Springtown, Texas. Does the child of God know his sins are pardoned? For a plain, simple illustration: Here is an old man who has been bowed together for a number of years with rheumatism, so he can in nowise lift himself up, and who suffers greatly at times. If some one gifted with divine power should come and heal him, instantly making his body whole in every part, the man, though he might be ignorant and unlearned, would know at once that he had been made free from his suffering, and if he did not shout and give God the praise for the blessing, he surely would feel like it. No power on earth could convince him that he was not free from the bondage of pain and suffering. So the man who has lived in sin for many years is, through the preached Word aided by divine power, led to Christ, and through His name, is made whole instantly, and is as conscious of his freedom from the bondage of sin in his spiritual nature as the rheumatic sufferer would have been after his physical restoration. Feeling and knowing this, it would be a puzzle to me to know how he could keep, or even want to keep, from shouting and praising God. In youth, the love of God in the heart gives peace and joy; in middle life, as the poor man toils daily among cares and disappointments, it gives him hope, joy and peace; and in old age, with pain and helplessness, God's love is a great anchor to the soul.

We are always glad to hear from our old friends, and our gladness is increased when the letters speak of God's goodness. The old friend who writes the letter from which we have quoted is a shut-in, confined to an invalid's chair year after year. With all his helplessness, he is still eager to do something for the cause of Christ, even if only to speak a kindly and encouraging word. He cannot go to church, but many good church people visit him, and others send him letters and cards that cheer him greatly. And the old sufferer, with God's love and the kindness of friends, finds the last years the best, in a spiritual sense at least. There are many such cases in our land where godly men and women, from physical and other causes, are set apart from the rest of the world. These "suffering saints" are entitled to all the sympathy and encouragement we can give them.

J. N. S., a reader in an invalid resort in New Jersey, sends this interesting letter: "Way out here in the country, away from the noise and strife, on top of a high hill, we patients have what I call a 'Millennial Sunday School.' There are 250 patients here, but we have no chapel yet; so the superintendent kindly permits us to use the schoolroom in the children's shack. The members are constantly changing, on account of the coming and going of patients, and a glance around the room is interesting. Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestant, black and white, male and female, all are in one class except the Juniors. We have all kinds of nationalities, including German, Scotch, Polish, English, American, Swedish, Italian, African and Jew. The sects seem to be as varied as the nationalities; still, we are always in harmony and have no friction. We do not wear long faces, believing in 'glad tidings' instead of the 'sad news' we so often hear. We use the International Lesson Leaves, and although we have no supporting body and do not take up collections, our wants for supplies have always arrived on time. As I was a hopeless drunkard before I was a Christian, it has been a privilege and honor for me to teach the school for over four months, dressed in my 'ministerial robes' of scout shoes, khaki pants, flannel shirt, and sometimes a sweater, as we are very democratic here."

W. M. C., Provost, Alberta. 1. There is nothing in Scripture to indicate an inspired writer yet to come. 2. Broadly defined, the soul is that conscious existence which is made up of desires, impulses, emotions and volitions. It refers to man in his natural state, untouched by the revelation of grace. It is his personality, what he is in himself, as distinct from all other people. He has, however, not yet reckoned with God, who has been revealed by Jesus Christ, and so he remains outside the temple of divine fellowship. His life will continue to be imperfect until he is "born again," and permits the Spirit of the Eternal, which is the Spirit of Christ, to take possession of him. When this takes place the whole man undergoes a transformation. He feels that the spiritual occupant of the temple of flesh is indeed an immortal guest within, reflecting, in thought, desire, act and disposition, the nature of God. Thus we know that the "living soul" in man, though undefinable by human terms, partakes of the divine nature and is imperishable. 3. In early times, eternal life was represented only as future happiness to be fully accomplished only after the resurrection and the judgment of the world. Later, the idea became precedent that the beginning of the eternal life is in the heart of the believer connected with his regeneration. The accepted present-day ideas of eternal life probably are We shall be hereafter entirely freed from the sufferings of this life; our future blessedness will be a continuation of the happiness of this life, but it will be increased by the addition of many new joys which stand in no natural or necessary connection with our preceding conditions in this life.

Laughin', callin' mother dear.
We don't have no fun no more
Since our daddy went away!
Don't seem any sport to play!
When our bedtime's gettin' near,
Mother wipes away a tear
When she thinks that we don't see.
Wonder when his ship will sail
Back across th' ocean foam
Bringin' daddy safely home—
Safely home to you an' me.

H. S. I., Jefferson, Pa. The question concerning the events described in Dan. 3:12-21 has often been asked, but no authoritative answer can be given, as the Bible is silent. It has been conjectured that Daniel was in some distant provinces of the kingdom at the time of the occurrence Nebuchadnezzar must have known enough of Daniel's character to be aware that he would not bow to the image; and as he valued his services, he may have purposely dispatched him to a remote part of the kingdom to avoid the risk of such a conflict as ensued.

M. T. E., Tropic, Fla. Please explain Heb. 10 : 26.

In this chapter we reach the conclusion of the apostle's argument, namely, Christ's offering of himself, as contrasted with the yearly offerings of the Law. Christ's priestly service is contrasted with the service of the priests, and his finished work is the inauguration of a new covenant in which, the law being written on the heart, and sin being put away and forgotten, no further offering is needed. In the 20th verse, the apostle makes his argument apply to the individual, and shows that, in order to become a participant in the new order of things, it will be necessary for each one to begin a new order of things in himself, and, among other changes to cease sinning wilfully. In a sense, of course, all sin is wilful, as it implies consent, but there is a distinction. The willing sinner is one who will sin, not in a single act, but as the result of a permanent state of deliberate action against the knowledge of the truth received. Such a one approaches apostasy, and, unless he sincerely repents, cannot expect to receive the benefits of Christ's sacrifice and the new covenant.

F. M., Santo, Texas. How may we interpret (1) Luke 17 : 35, 36 and (2) Rom. 9 : 15, 16?

1. As in the days of the destruction of Jerusalem, so in the last days there will be a separation of those found closely associated together. There will be a separation between the faithful and the unfaithful, as well as the gathering of the elect out of the world. The Pharisees had inquired as to the time when all this was to take place, and the disciples asked about the plan with reference to the separation spoken of. They did not understand. Our Lord's answer proclaims a universal application. The carcass, according to some commentators, represents moral corruption, and the eagle, God's means of certain punishment. 2. In quoting Jehovah's answer to Moses (Ex. 33 : 19), the apostle emphasizes the fact that as of old, so then and now, the Lord bestowed his grace not because of any merit of ours, but of his own free will, as an absolute gift, which is wholly unpurchasable.

R. T. S., New York. More than one thousand barrooms went out of business in New York City with the October 1 increases in the state surtax, added to the increased wholesale price of whisky, which makes that particular beverage cost a New York dealer $5.10 a gallon. About two thousand more liquor places in the state were closed, for the separate reason that the new law limits the number of liquor saloons to one for every five hundred inhabitants in political subdivisions having less than 55,000 people.

Mrs. M. T. R., Olean, N. Y. Rice has gone up in price with other provisions, but it is still about the cheapest of foods. One cup of raw rice will expand in boiling to about four cups of cooked rice, and this amount, in combination with a dish of meat or with beans or peas, will make a meal for a family of four. One pound of rice is equal to three teacupfuls, and even though rice costs ten cents a pound the amount mentioned should not cost more than three or four cents anywhere in the United States. Even at four cents the cost would be only one cent per person for this part of the meal.

Mrs. T. V. I., Mifflintown, Pa. I wish you would tell me in your columns, giving information, who the Hebrew prophet was who predicted the earth would disclose her blood when called upon to cover her slain. I suppose you have seen the account of battle-soil breeding flowers. It has been known to do so since the year 1693, after the battle of Landen, in the Netherlands, where more than 20,000 men were left unburied on the field. The soil broke forth in the following year into millions upon millions of scarlet poppies, covering the entire battlefield as if with a vast sheet of rich blood. The same thing occurred 120 years later, after the victory of Waterloo, and today it is occurring in France on the battlefields. It should be made the subject of botanical research.

The prophecy to which you refer is to be found in Isa. 26 : 21. It is interpreted as meaning that all innocent blood shed and other wrongs done shall be ultimately brought to light and avenged. See Gen. 4 : 10; Job 16 : 18; Ezek. 24 : 7, 8. It is doubtless true that blood enriches the soil, and that flowers have sprung up on battlegrounds. Your suggestion of botanical investigation of the subject is interesting.

Mrs. J. T., Stella, Wash. David Livingstone went to Africa as a missionary of the London Missionary Society, an evangelical organization of power and influence which had already sent out to mission fields in different lands some of the most famous workers in a century. Stanley was the correspondent of the New York Herald, and went to Africa in that capacity and not as a missionary. J. R. Mott may be said to belong to the broad evangelical school. His work for a number of years past has been interdenominational. He is probably the greatest modern leader of young life in missionary endeavor. He has been a member of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. since 1888, and has been associated with the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions since its inception. His leadership has been everywhere recognized, his travels, his addresses, his books have all been run through with the thread of consecrated leadership, and so certain is he of his call of God in his work that he has refused many attractive offers in other fields, notably a position as American ambassador abroad. He did, however, consent to serve on the commission which went to Russia under the leadership of Elihu Root to help that new republic establish its feet firmly in the way of democracy.

D. B. L., Sioux City, Iowa, and A. B., Roseville, Pa. The contents of the ninety-five theses which Luther nailed on the door of the church at Wittenberg in 1517 set forth his views concerning indulgences. Such preachers as Tetzel, to increase the sale of indulgences, perverted the authoritative theory and gave the impression that an indulgence wiped away the penalties of sin, even without true repentance. Luther's theses denounced the abuses of the indulgence system, and emphasized the necessity of faith in order to attain salvation

Madam Breshkovsky speaking to a closely crowding company of Russian soldiers

The Heart of Babushka

An Intimate Talk With Catherine Breshkovsky, the Mother of the Russian Revolution

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

Passed by the Russian Censor. Received November 5 through the State Department at Washington, D. C.

AS the former Czar was being carried from Tzarskoye Seloe to the Siberian city of Tobolsk, in the cold north land, tears formed in his eyes. "It is not for my own unhappy lot that I weep, but at the suffering that I have caused to others whom I have sent over this route." Meanwhile, high up in the Winter Palace in Petrograd, a sweet-faced old lady of seventy-three was telling me how the dreams of her life were coming true. Back from Siberia she had come, met everywhere by thousands of joyful peasants, a wonderful old lady, carried like a football hero on the sturdy shoulders of those whom she has described as the "best society in the world," the peasants of Siberia.

It is vain repetition to list the changes that Russia has seen since last spring; of how pamphlets that were formerly printed in secret cellars are now being sold in the entrance to the Duma and the splendid hall of the Taurida Palace; of how the Church of the Resurrection in Petrograd, which was erected to mark the spot where the Czar Alexander II was mortally wounded by the Nihilists, has changed from a monument to the tyrannical victim to a monument to the courageous assassins; of how the autocracy of czardom gave way to the autocracy of intoxicated peasants and workmen, drunk with liberty, which in turn is giving way to better judgment; of how a revolution, started because of the failure of the army, has resulted in military disorganization, which is proving more disastrous than ever.

Revolution is not evolution; and in Russia the former, born of a gradual change that dates back to the days of Novikoff, Radishtshev and Alexander Herzen, is also gradually giving place to evolution of a higher order.

In all this welter of change, dismay, disorganization and bacchanalian idealism, there is no romance more touching than that of the old "Grandmother of the Revolution" who was welcomed to the city of the greatest of Czars by the largest gathering that ever thronged Znamenskaya Square to welcome the exile to the city where autocracy had fallen before a moral force so great that bloodshed was unnecessary.

THE most appropriate heading that one can give to an article on Russia during these troublous days, when a huge nation is trying to find itself, is a date line. What is true today is false tomorrow. The cabled report and the magazine article written a month before give each other the lie. Yet in the midst of this chaotic change and confusion, I found Catherine Breshkovsky, who has prayed and sacrificed and fought for these wonderful days, the calmest person of all. She has known for many years that this day was coming and that she would live to see Russia a democracy. She faces the future as optimistically as she awaited the overturn of despotism. May this dear friend, whose farewell kiss and warm embrace is my most valued impression in this troubled land, live to see order restored and democratic Russia take its rightful place among the world's nations, enriched by the immense natural resources and the vigor of its unspoiled citizens, but even more blessed by the spiritual majesty which it undoubtedly has.

Slowly and with a care for the exact word which was remarkable, this fine woman of faith told me her story. Three mornings we spent in her Winter Palace room, where her table was piled high with loving letters and where her card tray bears the names of great statesmen, journalists and preachers from the ends of the earth. These letters and visiting cards are tributes of love to one who knows what love is, for she has given her life to the masses of Russia out of love for a much-abused race. In danger and privation, in the secrecy of prison camp and stuffy mine, "Babushka," the little grandmother, cast her precious bread upon troubled waters, but it has returned after many days, to gladden her declining years. Standing like a bulwark in the midst of awful stress rises her friend and protégé, Alexander Kerensky, for whom she feels a love like that of a mother for a son who honors her.

THE disorder in Russia is appalling. Even those who speak the language are lost in their own land. Time and again, when I have sought information or aid, a woman has succeeded where men have failed. And no man I have met has combined the patience, the moderation, and the spiritual strength in a serious crisis which characterizes Madame Breshkovsky. Such women make feminists of us all. Russia's choicest crown is her womanhood, and I know no brighter jewel in a rich treasure of womanly worth than this dear soul in her simple dress, who peers out across a troubled city and a square where pennons flutter in the breeze and the bands play inspiringly as regiment after regiment of Russia's manly strength departs for the front, but sees a bright day dawning in the East.

For it is to the East that Russia must look for strength. Neither in the semi-European city of Petrograd with its bread-lines and radical laborers, nor in Moscow, queen of Russia's cities, with its great industrial plants and financial strength, can Russia find its real soul. The soul of Russia is the soul of the peasant, stretching south and east to the heights of Ararat and the steppes of Mongolia; ignorant, confused, lacking organization, so that the glib talk of politicians has bewildered his unaccustomed brain. But Russia is an agricultural nation, and her strength and ultimate destiny reposes in the rude hearts of her sturdy farmers. These men may lack warlike patriotism. They may be too ready to forget and forgive their enemies. But Catherine Breshkovsky looks to them for the salvation of Russia, for she knows them as few Russians know them, and she says, "They are strong, because they are religious and good."

She speaks intimately and lovingly of Hull House and the House in Henry Street. On her table were several copies of a periodical edited by Carrie Chapman Catt. And this fine friend, who loves America and believes in its contribution to the world's welfare, hopes for and expects a much closer contact between Russia and America in the future. "To no other nation is democratic Russia so closely allied in spirit, for we know that there true freedom lives and casts its light abroad, hospitable to the oppressed, mighty in its spiritual vigor, and determination to serve humanity at any cost."

WHEN Kerensky, speaking before the great political conference in Moscow, urged upon his audience a "great, flaming love of country" he pointed the weakness of the Russian conglomeration of races and the strength of Madame Breshkovsky, who looked down from her box upon her young statesman-friend with justifiable pride, for her strength is that of an invincible heart rather than intellect alone. Her mind is vigorous at seventy-three, but it is only the handmaid of her all-embracing love, not for Russia as it is, but for the Russia that is to come, when her friends the poor will be freed, not only from tyranny, but also from provincial ignorance and apathetic fatalism.

The scene is in Moscow, the heart of Russia. Kerensky and his colleagues have come to lay the problems of a fearful crisis before the Russian people, from well-fed mill-owner to soldier delegate. Korniloff is there from the front. Milukoff has made his masterly but partisan arraignment of an heroic government in a time of deep peril. The Great Theater is thronged, not with human forms but with hopes and fears. The premier, with compelling eloquence, frankly tells the apathetic nation of its hour of peril. Now from the right and now from the left, applause rises to silence his voice.

There, in that huge auditorium, a white-haired, bent old lady raised her voice in an appeal for patriotism. She told of the awful ignorance of the masses, and appealed to the self-satisfied conservatives to come nearer to the rude peasants who, though despised, are the true strength of Russia in riotous revolt.

"Come nearer to the people," she said. "Enlighten them and lead them to a deeper understanding of life and to higher ideals for the future. The speeches that have been delivered here reveal a readiness to sacrifice for the good of Russia. But let us not rest here. Let ideas be turned into action and not remain mere words."

We talked about the Russian Church and its ability to serve in the social and political crisis. I had just come from an interview with a high official in the church, in which he had emphasized administrative changes. "Not administration, but love, is the need of the church," she said. "Love is not a matter of bureaucracy, but of the soul. And the church, if it becomes democratic, as seems likely, will serve the soul of our religious people. In the past it has comforted them in many ways, but too often it has acted as an instrument of control and oppression."

She considers the land question as most important, since the holder of the lands holds the power. But she is anxious that no illegal seizure be made.

"At the time of the revolution, the pomieschiks expected to lose their land. That idea was indissolubly connected with the whole revolutionary movement. But the peasants were not as well organized as the laborers and the soldiers, and the land question has been neglected because of the interest in the smaller matter of wages for industrial workers. In the meantime the large landholders are strengthening their hope that they can still hold their land and the power that goes with it."

"The peasants are incapable of sustained hate toward any one. That explains their lukewarmness in prosecuting the war. But it may rob them of their lawful rights in national and international affairs. They should be protected from their own good hearts and weak wills. Slowly, but surely, vodka is coming back. There is not a man that wants this curse to return to blight our land and cause sorrow among our women. But the people are too weak to resist its power, and the taste for alcohol still lingers to enslave them again at the first opportunity. Russia hates vodka with all her heart, but longs for it with all her appetite. The people must be protected from themselves by a law which they will willingly enact, but are powerless to enforce without government aid. With vodka stupefying us into inaction, but at the same time putting murder in loving hearts, the revolution could never have been inaugurated, or, if inaugurated, would have disgusted the world with its bloody cruelty and lasting hate. Our freedom from vodka was a necessary step toward our break with tyranny, and this freedom from drunkenness must be guaranteed our weak-willed people if we are truly to profit from the overthrow of a less powerful and repulsive despot."

Madame Breshkovsky sees a great need for thorough education in Russia, for only through education does she see any solution for the difficulties that endanger a republic whose citizenry is ignorant and illiterate.

"But education is not the only need," she says; "the Slavonic people require a Supreme Being, whom they can worship. They also need the great example of Jesus Christ. And the priesthood must become better educated and more moral." She feels sure, however, that the church will improve rapidly, and become a mighty leavening force in the new Russian democracy.

The lack of moral sense in Russia pains "Babushka" and she hopes to see the nation strengthened, not only through education but also through more stringent laws governing white slavery and the traffic in women. Here again, she sees no wilful wrong, but a striking lack of comprehension of the awfulness of conditions.

"Russia is not immoral, but it must not be unmoral. For a modern nation to lack moral stamina is for it to acknowledge national weakness."

THEN I asked her, there among her books and letters, to tell me something of her life. And she told of how, after reading the Book of Martyrs, the character of its heroes and heroines had impressed her as a girl, and she had come to the idea that she must not only be good, but good for something; how she must fight for better conditions for the people she loved. She told how her parents had forbidden her to travel among the people, but how they had told her that if she were married she could do anything her husband allowed, so she married a man who would let her carry on revolutionary work.

"But all my life, from the time I was a child, I have believed that if one wants faith, one must love, actively, and with all one's soul. All my life I have loved the peasants. I cannot help it. And loving them so, I have always believed that I would live to see them freed from oppression. While my friends among the revolutionists passed away one by one, I never felt that I should die before my friends were free. I have had a faith founded on love and a belief founded on my faith. I think it is always that way."

A scene from the Revolution. Russian Revolutionists at the Triumphal Arch at Petrograd

Madame Breshkovsky has been for more than half a century a woman of action rather than words. She has suffered and fought for the cause of freedom. As we talked together there in her room in the Winter Palace, I wondered if the chaos in Russia had not disillusioned her and if the lack of morale among her beloved but ignorant friends did not cause her pain. She has lost much of her youthful fire, and the privations she has endured for others have left their unmistakable but not unlovely mark. But this little bent woman, whose return to Petrograd was a personal triumph tempered by her modesty and carelessness of self, is still a force to be counted on in the coming days in Russia. For her love is a thing that the simplest peasant can understand, and when Russia seems on the very brink of disintegration and downfall, a surge of flaming patriotism may rise as a final testimony to the invincible spirit that lives in the loving heart of Babushka.

WHEN she was on her way from Siberia to Petrograd her friends asked her to write something of her life. There on the Trans-Siberian Railway, between ovations which greeted her at every station, this lovely lady wrote her life story. She gave it to me with full permission to publish it in the Christian Herald. I had it translated by a man whom I count as my friend, who also suffered exile. It is a modest story of a wonderful character in an epoch-making movement. "Little Grandmother" sends it with her blessing.

A Short Autobiography of Breshko-Breshkovskaya

I WAS born in 1844. My childhood was spent in the district of Chernigoff, and throughout my life I have been grateful to my parents for having brought me up well and for giving me a good and sensible education. They pitied the serfs and did not oppress them, and yet the great difference between the life that we, the pomieschiks, were leading and the miserable existence which the peasants were dragging out in their mean huts was so striking that my child's soul suffered greatly at the contradiction between our lives and the teachings of Christ. Our mother often read us the New Testament and the biographies of great champions of truth and justice toward one's fellow men.

Throughout my life I have thought so much and so constantly about the wants of the people and about their unhappy lot, that I have suffered only with them and gained joy only from their happiness. I have always recognized it as my duty to serve the people and to act in such a way that their eyes might be open to their life and needs.

My personal life has consisted of love and devotion to my country and my people, and of a passionate desire to serve my people as long as my strength lasts until death itself.

Often I am asked, "How did you reach your firm decision to live for the people?"

I believe this resolve has always existed in me, from my first consciousness. When I think back over my life, I first remember myself as a tiny girl of five, who was suffering all the time and whose heart was breaking for some one else. Now it was for the driver, then again for the chambermaid or the poor peasants, who were then only serfs. This impression of sorrow for the troubles of others was so strong in my youth that it has lasted all my life.

I was seventeen when, in 1861, the peasants were liberated from serfdom, but they were so poorly supplied with lands that they were once more forced to go under bondage to the rich.

THE emancipation of the serfs was followed by horrible executions. Their suffering went on before my very eyes and strengthened my desire to serve my people by any possible means, in order to make their bitter lot a little easier. There was not a trace of any revolutionary circles or organizations in the province at that time, but soon Zemstvo work was begun, and I did all I could to aid. For ten years I worked in the peasant schools, organized savings banks in the village, instituted mutual loan associations, and organized peasant councils, before the election of judges.

The work proceeded nicely, and the confidence that the peasants placed in me encouraged me.. But the nobles arose against me and my assistants. They denounced us to the ministers, and the work of years was swept away. They closed our schools and savings banks. The honest people were placed under strict surveillance by the Chernigoff government, and I was persecuted.

I saw then very clearly that the government of Alexander II was only talking reform and making believe to improve the lives of the peasants. In reality the government was wickedly persecuting all those who sought to help the workers to emerge from darkness into light, to attain knowledge, and to secure their just rights. It was evident not only in our district but throughout Russia that the government feared a growing consciousness on the part of the peasants and was trying to keep them in a state of utter serfdom, without any rights. This made me seek some other way to help my people, and late in the sixties I decided to go throughout Russia to enlist comrades in an illegal struggle,—a revolutionary propaganda not permitted by the laws of the Czar.

For more than two years I tramped all over Russia, seeking revolutionaries, but they were maintaining a discreet secrecy. Gradually, however, after trying one method after another, I joined an organization which was already rather large, whose members had decided to work among the people by direct methods, rather than by pamphlets and proclamations.

AT that time there was a great divide between the mighty sea of peasants and the small lake of intelligencia, and they had nothing in common. Besides, the peasants' distrust of everything that bore the earmarks of "gospodin" (gentleman) was so deep that it was quite impossible for us to introduce our ideas to the peasants and workmen as long as we wore the clothes of gentlefolk. We had to disguise ourselves from head to foot as genuine peasants.

Putting on a peasant dress and taking a bundle, slung over my shoulder on a rude stick, I started on a tour among the peasants. Although my tramp lasted only one summer, I succeeded in visiting many villages, and was received with perfect confidence. Eagerly the peasants listened to my words and those of my companions.

We taught that the land should not belong to individuals but to all who would work it. We did not believe in such a state of things that land was bought, sold and rented without consulting those who worked it—where a thousand dessiatines could be cornered by one person, with the result that his neighbors could starve for lack of land on which to apply their industry. The peasants agreed with us that the land should belong to those who worked it.

We also showed that the pomieschiks not only controlled the land but also the government, so that the peasants could not live a free life. And here again the peasants agreed with us. One subject was forbidden. We could not criticize the Czar.

We tried to make it clear that the Czar was not only on the side of the land-owners and officials, but was himself chief of oppressors. The peasants refused to believe this. They were so remote from political affairs and so ignorant through illiteracy that they had no idea how

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I

THE great British advance in Mesopotamia, involving the capture of Bagdad, interests students of prophecy even more than what is transpiring on the western front of the seat of war. The proclamation of General Sir Stanley Maude to the inhabitants of that city reads like an address of a victorious king of Israel or Judah to the same peoples in an earlier day. Speaking of the trade prospect now opened before Mesopotamia, and for that matter before the whole world, a member of the British House of Commons says: "It will mean eventually putting down something like a new Hamburg in the world. There are rich oil-fields near by, and the 'black country' of Mesopotamia may rise here, and the demands on European manufacturers for machinery and other things become enormous." We gather from other sources that railway construction across the Syrian desert will be so easy that probably Damascus will be connected with the Euphrates, and motor cars become as common there as on the Lincoln Highway across the United States.

However, we speak of Bagdad and its awakening only as an approach to the consideration of the awakening of its near neighbor on the southwest, the ancient and famous Babylon, whose history occupies so large a place in the inspired Word. It begins at the 10th and 11th chapters of Genesis in the record of the first world-monarchy under Nimrod. There, at Babel, or Babylon, was the scene of the earliest apostasy from God after the Flood; and, always the enemy of his people, she became in later days the metropolis of the great Gentile empire under Nebuchadnezzar. But as "God promised to remember his covenant with Israel, so he promised also to remember Babylon in the day of his wrath," and the purpose of this article is to show how that promise is to be fulfilled.

II

RETURNING to Genesis, we find that hundreds of years after the Flood the sons of Noah, Shem, Ham and Japheth, had greatly multiplied themselves and migrated to the ends of the earth. The Japhethites peopled Europe mostly, and are known to history as the Aryan race, which includes the Hindus, Celts, Greeks, Italians, Germans and Slavs. The Hamites went into northern Arabia, Egypt and Ethiopia or modern Abyssinia, while the Semites remained nearer the starting-point, giving origin to the Arabians, Assyrians and Hebrews, from whom came Israel, and finally our Saviour and Lord.

There is one individual among the Hamites, however, of whom we have particular record as the first world-monarch: Nimrod, the father in that sense of all the Nebuchadnezzars, Alexanders, Caesars and ambitious Kaisers down to the forthcoming anti-Christ. He was "a mighty one in the earth," or, as the Targum of Jonathan describes him, "a mighty rebel before the Lord." "And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel," the record says. His kingdom it was, indeed, and not the Lord's.

"And the whole earth was of one language and of one speech. . . . And they said, Go to, let us build us a city and a tower whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." There were two reasons for this action, the obvious and the occult. In the first place, the solidarity of the race was in mind, the application of the popular idea that "in union there is strength"; but back of this was a false worship, so false and so bad that it is ever after pointed to in Scripture as the earthly fountain-head and source of all idolatry and rejection of the true God.

"And God came down to see the city and the tower which the children of men builded," and he confounded their "one language" which had been put to so bad a use, and he scattered them to the four corners of the earth.

But now once more in the end of the age the world is moving toward unification, and a unification also that is without the knowledge of the true God, and, "conceived in sin and born in iniquity," it only can be doomed to failure, as was the first attempt in the same direction. God will again come down and interfere with things, and judge the nations that glory in their own achievements but do not glory in him.

III

BUT not to anticipate. Hundreds of years after Nimrod, Babylon for a second time occupies the field of history, and Nebuchadnezzar, like his great predecessor, is obsessed by the dream of world dominion. And God permits him to try it out. Indeed, He uses this king's ambition to punish other and smaller nations in their disobedience, which become his vassals. The story is told in II Kings, and in the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Daniel.

And of course Nebuchadnezzar is inflated by his power, and sets up his image to be worshiped, and renews the tower of Babel on the old foundations, and exclaims: "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power and for the glory of my majesty?" But "while the word was yet in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king, Nebuchadnezzar, to thee is it spoken; the kingdom is departed from thee." (Dan. 4 : 30, 31.)

The city also comes in for visitation as well as its royal builder, and the prophet Isaiah testifies:

> Babylon, the glory of the kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.
> It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch his tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there.
> But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there. . . .
> And her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged. (13 : 19–22.)

There are those who think this prophecy was fulfilled in the overthrow of the Babylonian power by the Medes and Persians, but I believe they are mistaken. This whole chapter of Isaiah and the next seem to be a single prophecy, and when so regarded there are at least eight features which were not fulfilled in that overthrow, and hence are yet to be fulfilled. Benjamin Wills Newton, in his book, too little known, "Babylon and the East," enumerates them thus:

(1) The whole land was not then destroyed (Chapter 13 : 5).

(2) The Day of the Lord did not then come (verse 6).

(3) The physical phenomena were not then seen (verse 10).

(4) The city was not then destroyed as Sodom and Gomorrah (verses 19–22). Indeed, the victory of Cyrus was almost bloodless, and the scepter passed comparatively quietly into his hands. Moreover, the land still yields an income to its Turkish rulers, and a city and village exist on its site.

(5) The Lord did not then visit Jacob with rest, nor has he yet done so (Chapters 14 : 1–3).

(6) The king of Babylon so minutely described (verses 4–22), has not yet arisen, which seems to point to a greater and more august being than the world has yet seen.

(7) The Assyrian was not then trodden down in the land of Judah, nor was the yoke then removed from Judah's neck (verse 25).

(8) The divine purpose on the whole earth was not then consummated (verse 26).

In other words, the blow which then fell on Babylon was premonitory only, a fact perfectly consistent with the divine method in other cases. "Indeed," to quote Mr. Newton further, "so strongly do present facts as well as events known from Scripture as about to occur in the land of Israel indicate Babylon's restoration, that if the Bible were silent respecting it, we should conclude nevertheless that its revival was not only probable, but well nigh certain."

IV

BUT the Bible is not silent. There is a general consent among students of the prophetic word that Zechariah, who prophesied long after Babylon was overthrown by the Medes and Persians, foretells her revival. In the fifth chapter of his prophecy he sees an ephah going forth and a woman sitting in it, and the interpreting angel said to him, "This is wickedness. And he cast her down into the midst of the ephah, and he cast the weight of lead upon the mouth thereof." And two women, with wings like the wings of a stork, lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven, and bore it "to build her an house in the land of Shinar [Babylon]. And when it is prepared she shall be set there in her own place."

An "ephah" is a Jewish measure, and suggests or symbolizes trade and commerce. It "goeth forth," indicating the spread of the idea it represents. "This is their resemblance through all the earth," the prophet says, and the margin reads, "This is their eye in all the land." Some render it "the aim (eyes) of all the land (earth) are upon it," as though, interpreting it in the light of present facts, the focus of human interest in the time appointed would be business efficiency and success, and the gain and wealth and the delicacies and luxuries which they permit.

Of the woman in the ephah, the angel says, "This is wickedness." It is unholy gain therefore that is in mind, harmonizing with what Isaiah in the Old Testament, and James in the New, predict of the end of the present age. "The house of Jacob will be replenished from the east with silver and gold, and horses and chariots," and also, alas, with idols! Isaiah says a false worship will thus accompany the increase of riches and luxury in the last days, and the figure of the woman in the ephah is in perfect harmony therewith, for the wicked women of the Bible, whether in reality or type, are always associated with idolatry.

The place where this woman's house is to be built, "her own place" as the prophet says, "is the land of Shinar." Babylon therefore will be at once the center of the world's luxury and the world's idolatry. The stork's wings carry the woman there, for swiftly will these events accumulate when the time comes.

V

BUT you ask the proof of it. In the first place, Zechariah's prophecy has not as yet been fulfilled. Nothing in subsequent history answers to it. What then does it mean, and when will it be?

While these questions are awaiting answer, we open the book of Revelation, which shows us "things which shall be hereafter," and at chapter 14 we meet with this:

> Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication

Here is Babylon again, Babylon in the future, Babylon whose destruction is once more foretold. May not this be the fulfilment of Zechariah's vision? Some say, No, because in their judgment Babylon means Rome, papal Rome. In other words, they believe the language of Revelation is symbolic in this case, and that under the name of that ancient city we have a veiled reference to the papacy.

But why so? The city is named again in chapter 14, when she comes "in remembrance before God." This is at the time of the battle of Armageddon, and every student of the Bible knows that this battle is not to be fought in Europe in the neighborhood of Rome, but in Asia and in proximity to "the land of Shinar."

Again, in chapters 17 and 18, she is referred to quite at length, and in the 18th more particularly is described as "a habitation of demons, and a hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird." Shall we say that this means Rome? I have some familiarity with the history of the papacy, and hold no brief for its defense. Its day of reckoning will surely come; but it seems to me that language like this is better fitted for what we know of Babylon than Rome.

But whether this be true or not, the chapter goes on to say, "All nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, . . . and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies." Without pausing to point out the untruthfulness of the identification of the first part of this verse with Rome, it must be admitted by all who have any acquaintance with her history that the last part does not belong to her. The merchants of the earth did not wax rich through the abundance of the delicacies of Rome, pagan or papal.

As a matter of fact, nine verses of the chapter are taken up with a lament of the merchants, shipmasters and sailors at the destruction of the city. No man buyeth their merchandise, or their cargo, any more, the vast range and character of which are so minutely described that Dean Alford said it more nearly suited London than Rome at any period of the latter's history. Sir Henry Rawlinson is authority for the statement that the Euphrates, on which Babylon rests, is navigable for 500 miles, and with very little effort could become so for ships of large size. On the other hand, Rome has no port, and no shipmasters go there, so that, to quote Bullinger, if Rome be the city, then Rome is yet to become the great political, commercial and religious center of the world, with both port and harbor. This revival of Rome, therefore, is about as difficult to believe as the revival of Babylon, and in either case it is simply a question of revival, and that at present is the point.

There are other verses in this chapter, the 4th to the 7th, which sometimes have been quoted in favor of the papal application. They begin thus: "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins." But this can hardly refer to Christians, who are thus being warned, as some say, to escape the papacy, for, as most teachers of dispensational truth believe, the faithful church will have been caught up to meet the Lord before the time of which those verses speak. It refers more likely to Jews at that time residing in Babylon, which a reference to Isaiah 48 and Jeremiah 51 makes almost certain.

VI

BUT some admit this literal Babylon in chapter 18, and yet see Rome in chapter 17. But we find no authority for thus separating the two. Indeed, the "harlot" of chapter 17 is distinctly called "Babylon the Great," and in a later verse identified as "that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth." Had the mistaken idea never obtained that ancient Babylon was destroyed long ago in fulfilment of prophecy, the thought of confounding her with Rome would never have occurred.

This is not to say that in symbolizing Babylon the woman does not also symbolize the vast system of idolatry connected with it. It is for this reason indeed that she is described as "the mother of harlots and of the abominations of the earth." The "earth"

The November Elections. Although politically what is known as an "off year." the battle at the polls on November 6 in a number of States and in several municipalities was exciting and important. New York City rejected Fusion and restored Tammany to municipal power by an overwhelming vote. The mayoralty candidates were Mitchel (Fusion), Hylan (Tammany Democratic), Bennett (Republican), and Hillquit (Socialist). It was a campaign noted for political mud slinging and misrepresentation. Hylan won by a record vote, leading Mitchel—the present incumbent, who had made a tremendous struggle for reelection—by 147,975 plurality. The vote stood: Hylan, 297,282; Mitchel, 149,307; Hillquit, 142,178; Bennett, 53,678. In the State, woman suffrage scored a notable triumph, the women of New York carrying through the suffrage amendment by a majority of 94,292. (The Empire State's majority against suffrage in 1915 was 194,934.) In the battle this year the metropolis won the day for the women, the majority in the city being 92,696. By this amendment the Empire State invests more than a million women citizens with the full measure of a citizen's power. The women announce that this victory in New York will be made the steppingstone to victory in the nation, pledging themselves to begin at once a campaign for the national suffrage amendment. In Ohio woman suffrage lost by 136,419 votes, but the amendment for Statewide prohibition at first reported carried in a very close election, appeared at this writing to have been defeated by a narrow margin.

Municipal elections in Chicago and Philadelphia also presented interesting possibilities. In Philadelphia the Republican machine won over the town meeting ticket which was backed by Senator Penrose, but won by a very small margin, which, it was possible, might be overturned by the votes of the soldiers in camp. In Chicago the election was only for judges of the supreme and circuit courts, and the campaign was between the Socialists and a nonpartisan ticket, the Socialist campaign being marked by anti-war sentiment. The non-partisan ticket triumphed by more than 80,000 votes, which was looked upon as a sufficient answer to the question of Chicago's loyalty. In Massachusetts, Governor Samuel W. McCall was reelected in spite of the fact that he was opposed by a former progressive on the Democratic ticket who made his campaign on a loyalty appeal. The Republican governor's outstanding loyalty and hard work for the boys in camp brought him an overwhelming victory. New Mexico voted "dry" by a comfortable margin. Massachusetts adopted by a majority of more than 75,000 an amendment which finally separates the state and church and places all denominations on an absolute par. The amendment prohibits the appropriation of public funds to, or the use of public property by, educational, charitable or religious institutions which are not controlled by public officers, or in which sectarian doctrines are taught. In the State of New Jersey, candidates for the legislature made their campaign on the issue of local option. The result was the election of a Republican assembly, pledged to pass a local option bill.

Completing Hay's Work. John Hay, once Secretary of State, wrote his name indelibly upon the history of the East by the arrangement which he concluded, known as the "open door" policy for China. In the last few years there have been many misgivings in some quarters, and the door seemed to be swinging shut. It was thrown open again, however, and the "open door" policy was again affirmed in an agreement in the form of a memorandum, which was subscribed to by Secretary Lansing for the United States and by Viscount Ishii, special envoy extraordinary of Japan and head of the special mission which recently visited America. The significant paragraphs of the agreement are as follows:

> "The governments of the United States and Japan recognize that territorial propinquity creates special relations between countries, and, consequently, the government of the United States recognizes that Japan has special interests in China, particularly in the part to which her possessions are contiguous.
> "The territorial sovereignty of China, nevertheless, remains unimpaired, and the government of the United States has every confidence in the repeated assurances of the Imperial Japanese Government that, while geographical position gives Japan such special interests, they have no desire to discriminate against the trade of other nations or to disregard the commercial rights heretofore granted by China in treaties with other Powers.
> "The governments of the United States and Japan deny that they have any purpose to infringe in any way the independence or territorial integrity of China, and they declare, furthermore, that they always adhere to the principle of the so-called 'open door,' or equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China."

This agreement is considered a guarantee of the integrity of China. The United States has also agreed to the postponement of payment of the Boxer indemnity and to the proposed tariff changes already approved by Japan, England and France. The Chinese minister at Tokyo on November 11 filed with the Japanese foreign office a note protesting against the Lansing-Ishii agreement.

The Liberty Loan. The final figures in the second Liberty Loan subscription campaign were made public on November 7 by Secretary McAdoo: 9,500,000 persons subscribed for $4,617,532,300 worth of bonds, and the government will issue $3,800,766,150 worth, American Patrol Boat Sunk. The converted yacht Alcedo, in the service of the United States navy in European waters, was torpedoed and sunk at 1:30 A. M. on November 5. Out of a crew of seven officers and eighty-five men one officer and twenty men were missing at last reports. The American steamship Rochester was sunk by a submarine on November 2. At last reports four of the crew were known to be dead and fourteen were missing.

A Day of Thanks. President Wilson issued on November 7 the usual proclamation setting apart Thursday, November 29, as Thanksgiving Day. The President said in part:

> It has long been the honored custom of our people to turn in the fruitful autumn of the year in praise and thanksgiving to Almighty God for his many blessings and mercies to us as a nation. That custom we can follow now even in the midst of the tragedy of a world shaken by war and immeasurable disaster, in the midst of sorrow and great peril, because even amidst the darkness that has gathered about us we can see the great blessings God has bestowed upon us, blessings that are better than mere peace of mind and prosperity of enterprise.
> We have been given the opportunity to serve mankind as we once served ourselves in the great day of our Declaration of Independence, by taking up arms against a tyranny that threatened to master and debase men everywhere, and joining with other free peoples in demanding for all the nations of the world what we then demanded and obtained for ourselves. . . . We should especially thank God that in such circumstances, in the midst of the greatest enterprise the spirits of men have ever entered upon, we have, if we but observe a reasonable and practicable economy, abundance with which to supply the needs of those associated with us as well as our own. . . .
> And while we render thanks for these things let us pray Almighty God that in all humbleness of spirit we may look always to him for guidance; that we may be kept constant in the spirit and purpose of service; that by his grace our minds may be directed and our hands strengthened, and that in his good time liberty and security and peace and the comradeship of a common justice may be vouchsafed all the nations of the earth.

Peace Envoy on War Mission. It was announced on November 7 that the American Commission to the Allied war conference had reached a British port in safety. The conference convened in Paris on November 15. Colonel E. M. House, who was last announced as having been delegated by the President to prepare America's case for the peace conference, was announced as head of this new Commission, which, in conference with our Allies, is expected to discover the way to victory. The other members of the Commission are Admiral Benson, chief of naval operations; General Bliss, chief of the general staff; Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Crosby; Vance C. McCormick of the War Trade Board; Bainbridge Colby of the Shipping Board; Dr. Alonzo E. Taylor of the Food Administration, and Thomas Nelson Perkins of the Priority Board. The Commission proceeded at once to London for conferences with the British authorities.

Our Boys Who Fought. Later reports of the first engagement of American troops in the trenches show that a small detachment of American infantrymen was attacked early Saturday morning, November 3, by a superior force of German "shock" troops. The Americans were cut off from relief by a heavy barrage in their rear, but fought gallantly until overwhelmed by numbers. Two French soldiers in the trenches with the Americans were killed, and the Germans lost some men, but were able to carry off their dead and wounded. Following this small engagement, violent artillery duels continued between the German and American artillerymen.

Fragments of News. The S. S. War Council has recommended to all Sunday schools that an offering or subscription be taken at Christmas time for the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee for relief of suffering in Bible lands. . . . Irving T. Bush, head of the Bush Terminal Company, was appointed on November 5 chief executive officer of the New York Port War Board, which is to mobilize every facility both on the New York and New Jersey sides of the port in the interests of war time efficiency. The Board will control all docks, piers, terminals and storage warehouses in the great port of New York. On November 8 the office building of the Hamburg-American Line at 45 Broadway, New York, was seized by the government as headquarters for the Port War Board. . . . Mexican outlaws, said to be followers of Villa, dynamited on November 6 a north-bound passenger train on the Mexican Central Railroad, fifty miles south of Chihuahua. Sixty federal train guards were killed, a number of passengers were wounded, and 110 bars of silver bullion were captured. Passengers on the train were robbed and several of them put to death. . . . The Fuel Administrator announced on November 5 that ten per cent. of the total coal output would, after that date, be taken over by it for distribution to homes, hotels and industries where a temporary shortage had worked a hardship. Dr. Garfield, Fuel Administrator, told the operators and miners on November 6 that it was their patriotic duty to join in keeping up the maximum production and in avoiding disputes. . . . Officers of Eastern railroads declared before the Interstate Commerce Commission, on November 6, that a fifteen per cent. increase on all commodity and class rates was necessary to meet increased operating costs, to make it possible for the railroads to meet the heavy emergency of war traffic. The appeal of the railroads was not opposed to the operators. . . . The National Woman's Party, responsible for the picketing of the White House, held a meeting in New York on November 8 at which it was announced that picketing would cease. On November 10 forty-one women from fifteen states were arrested in Washington for picketing. . . . The corn crop of 1917 was estimated by the Department of Agriculture on November 8 at 3,191,083,000 bushels, 66,000,000 bushels being the best previous crop. Potatoes were also announced as making a new record of 440,000,000 bushels. . . . The Order of Elks has donated to the nation a fund of $250,000 which will be used to construct a hospital for the reconstruction of maimed and wounded soldiers and sailors. . . . Masked men at Tulsa, Okla., on November 10, calling themselves "Knights of Liberty," flogged and then tarred and feathered seventeen members of the I. W. W. who were accused of having been concerned in a plot to terrorize the oil industry in Oklahoma. . . . The Philippine House of Representatives on November 11 passed a joint resolution offering to build for the United States navy a destroyer and a submarine. . . . The United Service announced on November 12 that $75,000,000 worth of food and supplies had been found secreted in New York City. There was $1,000,000 worth of sugar, nearly $13,000,000 worth of grain, and over $35,000,000 worth of steel, copper, cotton and jute. . . . The Food Administration announced that on December 10 all bakeries would be put under government regulation. Loaves at one pound, one-and-a-half pounds, two and four pounds only would be baked, and there was to be no baking of fancy rolls. It was announced that sixty per cent. of the country's baking was done in the home, and that the Administration expected the housewives to follow the lead of the bakers. It is planned to save 600,000 barrels of flour annually by doing away with the privilege of returning unsold bread.

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE event of the week has unquestionably been the attempted overthrow of the Russian government headed by Premier Kerensky, through a combination of the radical parties of Russia led by Leon Trotsky. This movement commenced on Tuesday, November 6, when Trotsky presented a demand to Kerensky on behalf of himself and those he represented to cede to them all the powers of the provisional government. This demand Kerensky refused, and on the same day appealed to the Petrograd garrison, the Provisional Parliament, and the conservative classes and parties of Russia generally, to support his government.

On Wednesday the adherents of Trotsky took possession by force of the State Bank, post office, telephone and telegraph central bureaus and the Marie Palace, in which the Provisional Parliament was sitting, and dispersed that body. During the night of November 6–7, the Petrograd garrison appeared to have gone over to the radicals.

The new government of Russia announced as its program the immediate conclusion of peace with its enemies, the division of the Russian land per capita among the population, the abolition of private property, the abolition of rank of all kinds, the equality of the sexes in short, in all respects a very advanced and radical program.

Wireless messages of November 11 reported that Premier Kerensky with an army from the front had captured Tsarskoe Selo, fifteen miles south of Petrograd, and was driving the Bolsheviki rebels in disorder before him, and that loyal troops had defeated the Bolsheviki in Moscow. Trotsky and Lenine were reported on November 9 to have organized a complete cabinet with Lenine as premier, announcing a plan to offer an armistice of three months during which elected representatives from all nations were to settle the questions of peace. The latest news seemed to indicate that the career of Lenine and his associates was approaching a quietus.

If Russia should abandon the war, the situation for the Allies and the United States, in view of the Italian catastrophe, would be one of extreme seriousness. According to the latest reports, Germany now has on the Russian front some ninety-one divisions, Austria 34, and Turkey 3, a division being approximately 20,000 men. This means 2,560,000 trained troops with all the equipment.

The exit of Russia from the war would open to the Central Empires a new source of supply for cotton, copper, wheat, oil, timber, leather, meats, and many other things. Thus Russia's retirement might defeat almost completely the purpose of the Allied blockade of the Central Empires.

A Grateful Nation

NEXT week will be Thanksgiving week. From "The Well in the Valley of Baca" Rev. Dr. C. C. Albertson draws a beautiful Thanksgiving message.

There will also be next week two special Thanksgiving messages: "The Heart's Thanks," by Charles Grant Miller, and a Thanksgiving story by Margaret E. Sangster.

Frank G. Carpenter has been put through the steel mills of Gary, but he came out in good shape. He will tell us all about it in next week's Herald.

Then there will be more pictures, and a battery of intensely interesting letters from the Neighbors.

THE report of the British Admiralty for the week in relation to the submarine sinkings is distinctly encouraging, being the smallest, as regards the number of victims, since the unrestricted undersea warfare began. Only eight vessels of over 1,600 tons were sunk, and four of less tonnage.

The Macedonian front has been very quiet during the week.

The Caucasus front has been lifeless, probably as a result of the generally disturbed conditions in Russia.

In Mesopotamia the British reported the capture on November 6 of Tekrit on the Tigris, ninety-seven miles above Bagdad. The British on the South Palestine front, on their eastern wing, after the capture of Beersheba late last week, made a further advance and carried their line eleven miles north of that town, so often mentioned in Scripture. On the other end of the line, toward the Mediterranean, on November 6, the British made an energetic thrust forward, which carried them to a point nine miles north of their line of departure. In this thrust, Gaza, an important strategic point, which for two thousand years has formed one of the two gateways into Egypt from the north, was captured. With the town a couple of thousand Turks and some twenty odd guns fell into the hands of General Allenby's forces. The net result of this week's advance has been to place the British within striking distance of Jerusalem, upon which city they are now converging both from the southwest and the southeast. According to late advices, the Turks have strongly fortified Jerusalem and intend to make the "Holy City" their base of defense against the British invaders. This, if true, may lead to a British bombardment of the city.

DURING the past week the situation on the Italian front has developed approximately, along the lines which were forecast in last week's article. After their expulsion from Udine and the line running south of Udine to the Adriatic, the Italian army was withdrawn westward by General Cadorna to the line of the Tagliamento River. Here the Italians attempted to make a stand, but owing to the fact that a Teutonic advance from the north speedily reached a point to the west of their lines and thus outflanked them, and also to the fact that after three days of effort the Teutons succeeded in driving a wedge across the Tagliamento, between the Italian left wing and center, the latter were obliged to abandon this position and retreat farther to the westward, to a new line of defense.

Where this new line of defense is to be located is not disclosed. There are two rivers, which suggest themselves: the Piave, 23 miles to the west of the Tagliamento, and the line of the River Brenta, still farther west. But the whole Italian position is so deeply involved by the delicate and dangerous position of the left wing, which is separated from the center and is being attacked simultaneously and without intermission both on its front and laterally from the north, that it is difficult to say which of these two rivers will be selected by the Italians for a serious stand.

This is rendered still more uncertain because political considerations enter into the question, as well as military. If the Italians do not attempt to defend the line of the Piave, it necessarily follows that they will have to abandon the world-famous city of Venice to the foe, with all of the resultant consequences upon the morale of the Italian people.

The line of the Piave has the tremendous disadvantage of being easily turned from the north, from the western end of the Carnic Alpine front, as well as of being attacked from the rear from the Trentino front, in case the Austro-Germans launch an offensive southeastward from the Sugana valley or from the Laverone plateau. Should these two movements be made simultaneously and successfully the result would probably be disaster without qualification.

The Brenta line of defense also has radical weaknesses, the principal of which is that the river does not extend over the whole of the front which the Italians would have to defend, covering only about half of it, in fact, the remainder being open defenseless plain.

While no doubt we shall see the Italians make a temporary stand on both the Piave and the Brenta lines, it seems highly probable that they may be forced to fall back to the line of the Adige River, still farther west from the Brenta, before they can make any serious stand. The line of the Adige is the first line of defense which is not turnable from the north, or attackable from the rear, and military prudence may dictate the early withdrawal of the Italian army to that line. Such a movement would involve the abandonment of the northeastern half of Italy, with all its famous cities, its civilian population and economic resources.

On November 8 it was announced that as the result of a conference between British, French and Italian representatives in Rome an inter-allied military committee had been chosen to take over the joint control of the whole western front from Belgium to Italy. General Cadorna was relieved of the supreme command of the Italian army to become a member of this new committee, with General Foch of the French army and General Sir Henry Hughes Wilson of the British general staff. The Italian high command was reorganized with General Diaz first in command, General Bodoglio second, and General Giardino third. The Italians reorganized, and under their new command began to offer vigorous resistance at the line of the Piave to the further progress of the Teuton armies. Austro-German attacks, however, on the Italian left flank and in the Trentino resulted in the turning of the Italian flank, the Germans capturing Asiago near the headwaters of the Piave, and the towns of Belluno and Vidor on the river. Italian counter-attacks recaptured some territory in the Trentino.

THE French portion of the western front has been, on the whole, very quiet during the week. There have been infantry clashes of purely local significance, at widely separated points, and frequent trench raids of minor importance and the inevitable artillery duels, but none of these have produced any material change in the respective positions of the adversaries.

In Flanders, on the British portion of the front, the British made an important gain, about the middle of the week, by the capture of Passchendael and the country immediately north and south. This capture gives the British complete possession of the crest of the ridge of hills running north and south to the east of Ypres. The effect is to place a screen obstructing the German view of British operations in the low country to the west of this crest, and at the same time to give the British observation points from which they can overlook the German lines to the east.

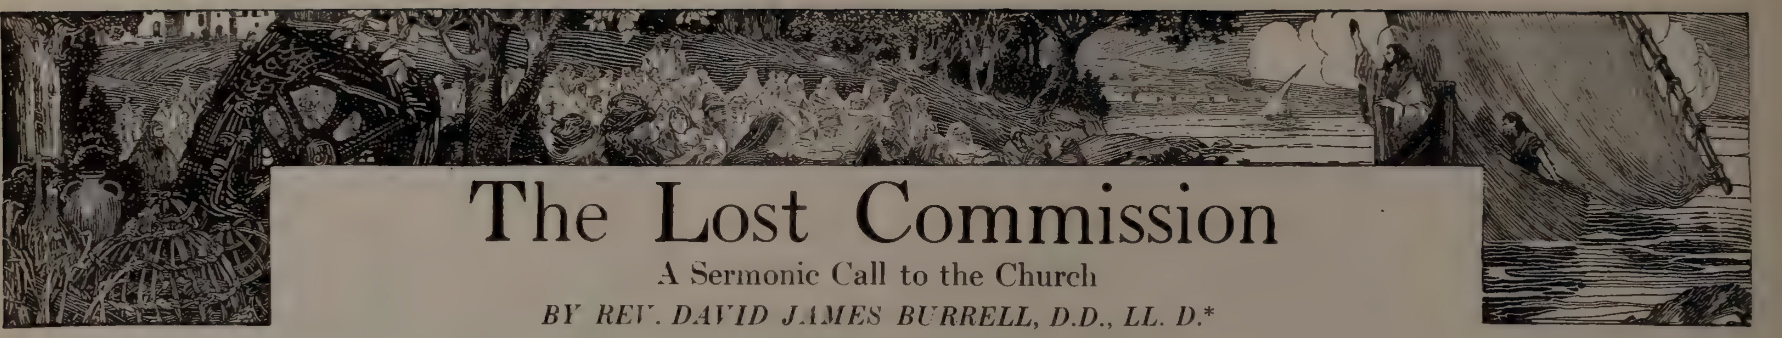
AMERICAN COMMISSIONERS AT THE PARIS WAR COUNCIL



The Lost Commission

A Sermonic Call to the Church

*BY REV. DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D., LL. D.

TEXT—Gen. 4 : 9. "Am I my brother's keeper?"

IF I were required to put the history of the world into a book I should call it "Evangelism;" because all progress, not only since the beginning of the Christian era but since the very beginning of time, has been measured by the propagation of the Gospel. Such a history would naturally fall into three periods of two thousand years each, namely, from Cain to Abraham, from Abraham to the Advent of Christ, and from Christ until now. The first period would begin with Cain.

The first man born into the world was the first evangelist; for what is an evangelist but one charged with the responsibility of looking after the welfare of his brother?

The validity of Cain's appointment was in no wise affected by the fact that he declined it. "The Lord said, 'Where is Abel thy brother?' And he answered, 'I know not; am I my brother's keeper?'" His hands were even then reeking with his brother's blood. What mattered it? His commission was unimpaired: "If thou doest not well, a sin-offering lieth at thy door. There is cleansing in the blood. Go; be the keeper of thy brethren from this time on!"

Observe, the Lord "set a mark upon him." Was this the mark of a curse? Oh, never! It was the mark of a curse removed by redeeming grace! It was the double mark of blood, the blood that crieth for vengeance and the blood of Christ that speaketh better things. And by the same token it was an assurance of the renewal of God's covenant with this man.

"And he went out"—whither? To meet his high calling? He was fully equipped for it. To him was intrusted the Evangel, "The Seed of woman shall come in the fulness of time to bruise the serpent's head." And his commission was clear, "Go, keep thy brethren for me."

But he was a slacker and runagate. "He went out to flee from the presence of the Lord." Thus conscience makes cowards of us all. He journeyed—this faithless evangelist—until he came and dwelt in the land of Nod."

WE leave him there, engaged in the building of a wonderful city which soon became the center of primeval kultur. A great leader was Cain among the cave-men of his time; and great were the henchmen who gathered about him; such as Jubal, master of the harp and organ; Tubal-cain, armorer and builder of armaments; and Lamech, "the striker," who led battalions to the high places of the field.

Nevertheless "the way of Cain" was at odds with the divine will and with the welfare of his fellow men. The people who went trooping after him to the land of Nod lived a self-centered life, in happy forgetfulness of all larger responsibilities. Meanwhile things went from bad to worse for two thousand years; insomuch that the Lord looked down from heaven to see if there were any that did understand and seek him; and he said, "There is none that doeth good; no, not one." Not an evangelist was left! Wherefore thick darkness came upon the earth; all the lights went out.

THE second period begins with Abraham.

The Lord found him in Ur of the Chaldees and said, "Get thee out from thy country and from thy father's house to a land that I will show thee; and I will make thy name a blessing to all the families of the earth." So Abraham went forth on a great evangelistic mission, for which he was fully equipped.

To begin with, he had the evangel respecting "the Seed of woman," that is, the coming Christ who was to deliver the world from sin. It was not strange that his heart misgave him on that blind journey to a land that he knew not; but in such seasons of depression the Lord pointed him to the starry heavens, saying, "So shall thy seed be." A new emphasis was placed upon the Messianic hope in the words, "In thy Seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed!" Not in him but in the Messiah was the promise of the Golden Age: as Jesus said, "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it and was glad." His pathway by the banks of the great river led straight to Bethlehem and Calvary. His call was to the promulgation of the life-giving Hope, until all the families of the earth should be blessed in receiving it.

For this he and his household were set apart as a "chosen people;" chosen not only to peculiar privilege, but to special responsibility; as it is written, "What advantage, then, hath the Jew? Much, every way; but chiefly because that unto them were committed the oracles of God."

To this mission of universal evangelism they were not only "chosen" but separated. The land of Palestine to which they were assigned was singularly fitted to this end, being like a closet, whose door was divinely shut to protect them from the contaminating influence of all surrounding tribes. It was completely hemmed in by the northern mountains, the southern desert, the eastern heights of Jordan and the Western Sea.

But all this splendid equipment was in vain. The oracles were neglected and the divine commission to evangelize all nations was so far forgotten that the outlying people were hated and shunned as "dogs of Gentiles." Were the Israelites their keepers? Oh, no! The hope of Israel was reduced to a contemptuous boast, "The temple of the Lord are we!"

Thus, like Cain and his followers, they went out and dwelt in the land of Nod." In vain were all remonstrances, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; the ox knoweth his master and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider!"

By slow degrees the lamps of the golden candlestick flickered and went out.

THE third period begins with Christ.

"He came unto his own, and his own received him not." The hope of Israel had been so dimmed by long disuse and disregard that when he came "whom kings and prophets longed to see and died without the sight," they rejected him! He seemed to them as a root out of dry ground, in whom was no form nor comeliness nor any beauty that they should desire him. This people, chosen to evangelize the world in the promulgation of his saving grace, hung him up betwixt heaven and earth, where—blessed be his name!—he "bare our sins in his own body on the tree."

But during the brief period of his ministry he had reorganized the church out of the "remnant" of Israel. The twelve men who were recruited from fishing boats and tollbooths—a feeble folk like the conies—were the nucleus of the great living organism through which Christ proposed to establish his kingdom of truth and righteousness in this world of ours. They were divinely called not to save themselves but to evangelize all the children of men.

For this purpose they were adequately endowed. They had the evangel; not as originally given in "the hope of Israel," but as doubly emphasized by Christ in the promise of a second advent, when he promised to come in glory and great majesty to establish his kingdom and to rule from the river unto the ends of the earth.

They had the oracles in which was enshrined this surpassing hope, as well as the promise of personal salvation to all believers in Christ. They were not required nor expected to regenerate souls— which is a divine prerogative—but to give the Word to the world. in full confidence that God would honor it.

They received their commission in unmistakable terms: "Go, evangelize!" The Lord, having laid the foundations of his Kingdom and cemented them with his blood, met his disciples—not the Twelve only but "about five hundred at once"—on the Mount of Ascension, where he gave them his final instructions; "All power is given unto me in heaven and earth; go ye, therefore, and evangelize all nations! Ye are my witnesses; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world, Amen."

BY this it appears that the Great Commission was not only for a few chosen and ordained men, but for all true followers of Christ. Leaders are necessary in all great enterprises; but battles are won by the rank and file. So it is written, "He gave some to be apostles, some prophets," etc., "but unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ."

With their commission they received an assurance of power to fulfil it, "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you." And again the Lord said, "Tarry ye in Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." Ten days, accordingly, the disciples tarried; when the effusion of the Spirit came "as with the sound of a rushing mighty wind, and cloven tongues of fire sat upon each of them." So were they all, as witnesses, fitly prepared to speak "as the Spirit gave them utterance." In like manner there is a gift of tongues for all and several who are willing to witness for Christ.

Must we "tarry," then, for the baptism of power? No, not ten days, nor ten hours, nor ten minutes! The Spirit came at Pentecost once for all. Whosoever is "willing in the day of God's power" may receive the baptism here and now.

All this was nearly two thousand years ago!

Come, Lord, and tarry not:
  Bring the long looked for day;
Oh, why these years of waiting here,
  These ages of delay?

The fault is not the Lord's. What more could he have done for his vineyard that he hath not done for it? It is the church's fault that he delays his coming: and the church is simply an aggregation of units, like you and me.

W*E have lost our commission.* We have contracted the habit of farming out personal responsibility to a few leaders in canonicals. This is why, after "all these years of waiting here," there are twelve hundred millions of people in the world who have never heard the Gospel and know not whether there be any Saviour. Four hundred millions of Christians, all enlisted as evangelists and equipped under the Great Commission, and twelve hundred millions of immortals still dwelling in the regions of darkness and the shadow of death! Hear them every moment as they pass, lockstep, quick-step, out into the dark.

Meanwhile what is the church doing? Dwelling in the Land of Nod. Praying, "Thy kingdom come." Singing

Waft, waft, ye winds, his story,
  And you, ye waters, roll,
Till, like a sea of glory,
  It spreads from pole to pole!

But the story of salvation is not wafted by the winds nor rolled by the waters of the sea. It is carried by the Lord's "witnesses," who go, as they were commanded to go, out into the highways and hedges, the remote frontiers, and to the regions beyond, with the life-giving messages of divine grace.

It is not enough that preachers should be ordained, missionaries sent to pagan lands, and evangelists summoned to revive our barren vineyards. All hail to the leaders! But no man can serve the Lord by proxy or fulfil his commission by deputizing another to do it.

It is not enough to organize missionary boards and societies and committees within the church. The church is organized to death; "wheels within wheels, as it were a wheel within a wheel." Responsibilities will never be duly met until it is realized that the church itself is nothing but a great missionary society, of which every individual member is a missionary-evangelist, sent into the world as the Master himself was sent, "to seek and to save."

Meanwhile the twelve hundred millions are left as sheep without a shepherd. If the Lord delayeth his coming, it is because the sign is unfulfilled. "Tell us," said his disciples, "when shall these things be?" And he answered, in terms beyond all doubt or peradventure, "The Gospel must first be preached throughout the whole world; then shall the end be." This is the sign: it is for us to fulfil it.

IN view of such considerations what shall we say? The application is a personal one. "The kingdom of heaven is within you." It begins with such units as you and me. Dwellers in the land of Nod make no conquests for Christ. To those who stand idle in the market-place the Husbandman comes with a sickle in either hand, saying, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work. Say not, It is yet four months, and then cometh the harvest. Lift up your eyes and see; the fields are already white unto the harvest! Here is thy sickle: Come with me; and thou and I will save the world today!"

A man may refuse and, so far forth, postpone the progress of the Gospel. But, blessed be God, he cannot prevent it! But, oh, the immeasurable loss to laggards and hinderers! They miss "the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." The Kingdom rises, like the House Magnifical, and they are having neither part nor lot in the glory of it!

The time is coming when the church will awake and loose herself from the bands of her neck and put on her beautiful garments of faithful service. Then, when every man shall be his brother's keeper, and the Gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world even to the last man, the clouds will rend asunder and the air be vibrant with the cry "Maranatha! The Lord cometh!" And his glory shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea

Or Rather!

SUNDAY, November 25. Gal. 4 : 9. "But now after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God." The latter way of stating the believer's wealth was to Paul far the more wonderful. It was a "rather" that opened out vistas that were unutterable. Whenever, in any of his letters, he comes in sight of the glory, his soul breaks forth in rapturous doxology. In a certain way Nathanael knew Jesus; but when he discovered that he was known of Jesus the fountains of a holier wonder began to flow. And so it was with Zaccheus; he had a faint elementary knowledge of the Christ; but when it unexpectedly dawned upon him that he was known of Christ, springs of joy welled forth which he had never experienced before. But in a loftier and still more sacred sense, a sense into which Nathanael and Zaccheus entered at a later day, the apostle Paul gloried in the consciousness that he was known of the redeeming God, who had gone forth among the children of men in the saving ministry of love and grace.

For God's knowledge of Paul was not the mere knowledge of perception, or of discrimination, or of dry intelligence; but the knowledge of which love is the organ—the yearning, imparting, hallowing communion of the Father's heart. Perhaps we may get a glimpse of different kinds of knowledge by comparing the mere botanist's knowledge of flowers, and the gardener's knowledge, and the poet's, and the lover's. I read a book on "The Scenery of Switzerland;" it was by a geologist. And then I read Wordsworth's sonnets on the same scenery. Each revealed his own type of knowledge, but one entered into secrets of which the other did not dream. If all these ministries of knowledge could be combined in one searching, kindling, quickening light!

When, therefore, Paul speaks of God's knowledge of him he does not think of it as dazzling heavenly rays falling upon him as the beams of a searchlight fall upon a cottage on some bleak and desolate shore. It is the knowledge of a communion—perhaps a road more than a light—a road filled with divine commerce, even the marvelous riches of redeeming love. In that knowledge are combined the secrets of heavenly wisdom, the gifts of divine love, and the ministries of eternal grace. In that knowledge Paul found his rest, and his hope of one day awakening in the likeness of his Lord. J. H. J.

From Day to Day

MONDAY, November 26. Ps. 96: 2. "Show forth His salvation from day to day." Here is a plea for daily evidence that God's Spirit inhabits our hearts, for daily demonstration of Infinite Power brought to bear upon finite tasks. This is a toilful world. It is fortunate for us that it is so. A weary life would be ours if our only labor were to kill the time, idly to drift from day to day. Folks who die of nothing to do suffer terribly. With our tasks come problems to be solved which tax our intellects, strain our emotions, and make demands upon our wills. Yet these very tasks are the raw material out of which we are to construct the stately temples of useful lives.

"His salvation" is our salvation. In showing forth His righteousness we build our own characters and go from strength to strength. It would be difficult to find any other single phrase which so adequately describes the practical character of Christianity as this: "from day to day." Our salvation is a daily affair; that is, the grace of God operates in our lives in a present and continuing sense. It would be quite comfortable indeed if we could only obtain once and for all as a gift or as a purchase the saving grace of God. Salvation is no such superficial thing as either a title or a tattoo. It is like health which we must guard from day to day, and which guards us from day to day. The three syllables in the Hebrew word Jehovah are said to have mystic signification covering the three divisions of time, past, present and future. Today is the link that binds together yesterday and tomorrow. We who show forth salvation from day to day thus build a bridge across the swiftly flowing stream which separates the past from the future. Thus religion becomes an eternal thing. C. C. A.

Death

TUESDAY, November 27. I Thess. 4 : 13, 14. "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." Death is hardly ever a welcome guest in our homes. Even where its coming has been a long time expected and where it brings release from suffering, there is in nearly every case some tender tie of affection severed that connected the departing with some survivor. Parting brings sorrow, often very keen and profound sorrow. Nor need we feel ashamed when on such occasions the tears start to our eyes and a melancholy feeling settles upon our mind. Jesus wept at the tomb of his friend Lazarus, and his apostle exhorts us to weep with them that weep.

But the Christian who comes out of every tribulation more than a conqueror, and who knows that death has lost its sting since Easter morning, knows how to offset the somber aspect of death with a most pleasant view: he views death as a sleep. He looks ahead to that eternal morning when the voice of Jesus shall summon from the unnumbered graves of this earth the vast multitude of death's victims and His angels will gather those who are His by faith in His redeeming work to Him, that they may forever be with Him, where sorrow, pain, and dying are no more.

Christians know and cherish this blessed truth as part of their glorious faith. It is the bright hope which lights up the gloom of the death-chamber and the grave for them. But they are apt to forget it when the sense of bereavement is strong and their feelings are depressed. They may act for a moment as if they were ignorant of the fact that to the believer in Christ death has lost its awful meaning. They need to rouse themselves out of their momentary distress and despondency with the prospect of the future resurrection and the life everlasting in the presence of Jesus. Theirs can never be a sorrow without hope. They know that they will meet their loved ones again at Jesus' feet. W. H. T. D.

Miriam

WEDNESDAY, November 28. Num. 12 : 1. "And Miriam spake against Moses, because of the Ethiopian woman whom he had married." The name Miriam is the Hebrew for Mary. She is the Mary of the Old Testament—a woman of strong, noble character, the wife of Hur and the sister of Moses and Aaron, and a distinguished leader among her people. As a little girl she was faithfully watching the basket boat of her baby brother, floating amid the bulrushes of the Nile, when the Egyptian princess came down to wash in the water. The baby crying at just the right time touched the hearts of the ladies, and shrewd little Miriam procured Moses' mother for the nurse, to care for the little fellow. Thus Miriam saves Moses and enriches the world.

The next view of her devotion is with Israel on the banks of the Red Sea, after the overthrow of Pharaoh's hosts. There she is leading in the glorious song of triumph.

When Miriam was advanced in years, she, with Aaron, revolted against Moses for marrying an Ethiopian woman, not because of her color, but she was a foreigner, and race prejudice was very strong. Miriam mutinied against the authority of Moses. The venom of her tongue was destroying the influence of God's appointed prophet; therefore the Almighty smote Miriam with leprosy, and Moses, though he had been sadly wronged by his own sister, cried out in prayer for her cure, saying, "O Lord, heal her now," And his petition was answered. Wonderful meekness and brotherliness of Moses! An instructive lesson to the Miriams that create divisions in families! We should heed God's command, "Do my prophets no harm." E. W. C.

A Three-Fold Commandment

THURSDAY, November 29. Ps. 96 : 2, 3. "Sing unto the Lord, bless his name; show forth his salvation from day to day. Declare his glory among the heathen, his wonders among all people." Christianity has been called a singing religion. It is, and it is the only singing religion. Other religions may be equally meditative, equally philosophical, but no other religion so constantly exhorts its devotees to sing and to rejoice. He was a good representative of our faith who, in full thought of what religion had done for him, exclaimed, "Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing." A devoted servant of our Lord, heavily burdened with the cares of life, walking along a crowded city street one day, was seen to pause and was heard to laugh aloud. Passersby marveled at the strange behavior of the man. Little children looked at him with wonder somewhat mixed with fear. What was it moved him to sudden mirth? He had been "stung by the splendor of a thought." It had just flashed upon him that in his fear that the grace of God might fail him he had been like a minnow in the sea, fearing that the ocean might go dry. God's Spirit had suddenly brought to his remembrance the promise, "My grace is sufficient for thee." There are two great words in the New Testament which are capable of bringing such a sense of joy. They are "sufficient" and "abundant." Grace sufficient and abundant. Is there abundance in the sea? Have you not marked how the great waves roll up, submerging wide acres and drenching high cliffs? That is abundance, and God's mercy is abundant. Therefore, "Sing ye," "Bless ye," "Rejoice ye."

Harold Begbie speaks of the magical effect of religious music in the slums, of the marvelous impulse it has imparted to lives that were sullen and silent until the grace of God lifted them out of the Slough of Despond. True to Christian experience are the words of the poet, "How can I keep from singing?" True to our longing are the words of that other song, "If I were a voice . . . I would sing." C. C. A.

When the Lord Comes

FRIDAY, November 30. Ps. 24 : 7. "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in." It may be that this shout of welcome was raised by our fathers in the Old Testament times whenever the ark of the covenant was set up among them in a certain place, as happened in the days of David. The ark was the symbol of God's presence among them. God had said: "In all places where I record my name I will come unto thee and bless thee." Jesus taught his disciples to pray: "Thy kingdom come," and gave them this promise: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them." There is a gracious coming of the Lord to his people which is effected through means which he has appointed: his holy Word, and every ordinance to which he has attached his word of command and promise, like baptism and the Lord's Supper. Wherever these means and ordinances are in actual use, where the word of God is taught in truth and purity and men are leading lives in accordance with it, there the Lord comes to them invisibly in the plenitude of his grace.

In New Testament times such occasions are when the household gathers around the family altar for devotion, when the individual Christian retires to his private room for prayer and meditation, when the multitude of worshipers come together on the Lord's day at the sanctuary to hear God's Word preached and to join in prayer and praise to their Creator, Redeemer and Comforter. Such occasions we too should hail with delight. It is a great condescension on the part of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ when he deigns to visit poor sinful men. This earth, the entire universe, is far too small to contain him. His boundless glory dims the luster of the most magnificent building that men can rear for his worship and adoration. The doors should be thrown wide ajar and enlarged to signify that he is a welcome guest. We know—for he has told us—that temples made of men's hands are not his most delightful dwelling-places, but humble hearts that bow in reverence to his teaching, admonition, warning, and comfort. He loves to dwell with him "that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at His word" (Isa. 66 : 1, 2).

The Great Secret

SATURDAY, December 1. Ps. 25 : 14. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." Is it not blessed to discover the secret key which unlocks the mystery of the Godhead? Without this, one lives in slavish fears of the Divine Being, or doubts and denies him altogether. The key to God's heart is the filial fear of love. He that loveth him knoweth him. We love him because he first loved us. Love begets love. We trust where we cannot trace. The searching power of the understanding cannot find out God except in parts of his ways. The labyrinths of science are the outer court, while the holy of holies lies within. The secrets of nature yield to study, exploration and discovery, but the secrets of the heart of the infinite Father are only felt and known while reclining upon his bosom. There God is unveiled, transfigured and revealed to the embrace of faith.

While the stars declare the glory of his hands, and beauty the magic of his artistic skill, his inner spiritual being reveals the source of all the outer streams of his marvelous magnificence. To know God is to know all in the ages coming.

As Paul wrote to his converts, "I have you in my heart," so God says to us, "Thou art mine; I have called thee by thy name." His power defends us, his love fills us, his peace quiets us. God will reveal the great secret, "Christ in you the hope of glory," to all who are willing to dwell in the secret place of the Most High and abide under the overshadowing presence of the Almighty. The Meaning of the Elections

THE real significance of the recent election results in New York City and throughout the country is to be found in two outstanding facts.

The patriotic pose for electioneering purposes does not deceive, but disgusts, the American people.

The daily newspapers have lost their power to influence the popular mind on political questions.

In every election held within the past year both of these facts stand out prominently in the results. Special congressional contests in New Hampshire, Indiana and North Dakota had resulted in defeat of otherwise strong men who made the mistake of assuming to themselves superior patriotism and denouncing their opponents as disloyal. In spite of these warning results, Mayor Mitchel of New York based his campaign for reelection upon the proposition that he was the only one of the four candidates who was true to his country, especially charging his chief opponent with various disloyal connections and traitorous activities; and he was defeated by that opponent by the highest plurality ever piled up in a New York mayoralty election.

In his attitude Mayor Mitchel had the vigorous support of the World, Times, Tribune, Sun, Herald, Globe and Mail—every great New York daily except one. Yet of the 650,000 votes cast 500,000 were for candidates other than the "only patriot," and in spite of his huge battery of newspaper support.

These results are in fact no expression of disloyalty at all. Sedition has not triumphed anywhere. The American people are patriotic, and their majority vote is the true expression of patriotism. The results are a stinging rebuke to those who would use the patriotic spirit of the country for unpatriotic purposes of self-advancement.

The Sugar Shortage

A READER of this journal writes from Jersey City, N. J., presenting a phase of the food question which is doubtless puzzling many others. His letter says:

> A five-dollar bill doesn't go very far in the matter of food purchases these days. In the face of the admonitions of Federal and local officials, and of Mr. Hoover's timely warnings, the profiteers, wholesale and retail, are making a financial harvest at the cost of much needless privation inflicted upon a defenseless public. We expected a rise in price in nearly all the staples, but here is what puzzles me: Sugar in and around New York (including Jersey City, of course) is hardly to be had for love or money. Some of the restaurants where I eat are serving light brown and others powdered sugar in minute quantities, and explain matters by saying they can get no other kind, and very little of these two. Yet in Chicago high grade sugar is selling at four and five cents per pound, the best granulated costing $5 per 100 pounds. There is, of course, a sugar shortage owing to the war, but how are we to explain the difference between Chicago and New York of 100 per cent. in prices? And it's pretty nearly the same with regard to flour ($13.50 a barrel in New York and $10 to $11 in Chicago), and some other staples.

The situation, as our friend outlines it, is certainly a vexatious one to householders, but we understand that there is an early prospect of lower prices and more plentiful supplies.

Mr. Hoover, referring to the sugar shortage, reminds us that the Food Administration long ago pointed out what was coming, and made the simple request that our people should save seven ounces a week per person, in order to give our Allies what they must have and supply what we need ourselves. If this had been done, or should now be done, he reckons that our ration of sugar per person per year would be 67 pounds, while the English have to be content with 26 and the French and Italians with 12. These are times when we must put our patience in team with our patriotism. All countries are suffering from the needs caused by the war, and we cannot escape. But we have the assurance that the profiteers will be looked after sharply, although it will take time. Drastic measures applied by the Federal and state authorities to a few score of the worst offenders would produce wholesome results just now.

The Church for All Mankind

A UNIQUE gathering with a unique function is the Board of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church in semi-annual session to review their work for the preceding six months and to plan it for the next half year. Perhaps no one of their transactions at Atlantic City lately has a larger interest for the general public than the address of that religious statesman, Bishop Bashford of China, on the law and service of Christ as stated to the Pharisees in the two great commandments—love of God and of your neighbor—and as illustrated in his own life and sacrifice. Dr. Bashford showed that, rightly interpreted, nature and the human race are under one law—that of unselfish service. The tree, the herb, the plant lives not unto itself, but for the salvation of its species; the wolf and the tiger manifest savagery for the preservation of their species; the so-called savage races are savage because they have not learned the higher law of unselfish service proceeding from love of God and neighbor. The stress of nations in the world-war is due to forgetfulness or misunderstanding of Christ's teaching, and there can be no lasting and beneficent peace until this doctrine has been learned that it may be lived. God set up the family to show that the individual must not live unto himself, the state that the family must not live unto itself, and the church that the state must not live unto itself. The nation may be limited to people of one tongue and race, but the church is not truly Christ's Church unless it is broad enough to welcome all mankind and embrace all tongues, all colors, and all races.

Women More Cruel Than Men ?

AN official of the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals complains of "cruel women who come to the meetings of the Society wearing aigrettes of the plumage of birds that are obtained by the slaughter of the mother-bird and the starvation of the brood."

On this solid foundation of fact one might feel secure in concluding that women are, as a sex, more cruel than men.

All eyes have seen the woman with the bird on her hat. She wears this particular badge of her cruelty where it cannot escape being seen and for the sole reason that it may be seen.

But is it not unfair to condemn women as utterly cruel because of this one fault? After all, it is not so much a fault as a frailty. Women's vanity is an overpowering passion, and if they must feed it upon the plumage of slaughtered birds are they any worse than men who glut their greed upon the fruits of others' life-crushing toil?

Cruelty is really a very infrequent vice among women. Even bird-wearing is far from being universal among them. It is impossible not to remember that the whole structure of the movement on behalf of humanity to all creatures which has reached greater proportions in this country than in any other, is founded in the first instance on the tender-heartedness of American women. It would be interesting to know how far the S. P. C. A. movement would ever have progressed but for the inspiration and enthusiasm that have come from women.

Retribution in Kind

HOW true is the divine Word, "Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein"! He is snared by his own devices. It is said that opportunities fly in a straight line, but the wrongs we do others fly in a circle, coming back to the starting point, thus furnishing an awful fitness between crime and penalty. It seems like making the sinner punish himself, for "with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." Pilate, who ordered the crucifixion of Jesus, committed suicide, tradition tells us. Herod, who slew the infants of Bethlehem, soon had no children in his own family. Maximinus, who put out the sight of thousands of Christians, died himself of a fearful disease of the eyes, and Haman was hanged on the gallows built by his own order for Mordecai. The same ax that Danton and Robespierre used to sever the heads of the nobility of France guillotined their own heads at last.

Rulers like Alexander and Napoleon, who took the sword for conquest, lost their own thrones by the sword. Strange that men will insanely follow each other in a headlong rush down into the same pit where multitudes have fallen! It is like Marshal Ney, leading his cavalry in their last charge at Waterloo, down into the unseen ditch of the sunken road where their dead bodies made a living bridge for the remaining few to pass over and be destroyed by the enemy's solid squares. How many believe Satan's lies, "Ye shall not surely die," rather than the Word of God, which endureth forever! We refuse to believe that the poisoned cup will at the last bite like a serpent and sting like an adder. It is said that, in ancient times, the model of a serpent was formed in the bottom of a golden goblet; those who drank the ruby liquor knew nothing of what was in the cup until they came to the last draught, and then the reptile's gleaming head and fiery eyes struck a shudder to their hearts. So every rebellious soul, as he comes to the bottom of the cup of life, will behold the glistening eyes and uplifted fangs of the serpent of sin. The stings of remorse will ever remind him of the fact, "You knew your duty but you did it not." Christ and the shelter of his cross is the only refuge for the sinful soul.

Income for Marriage

A CLEVELAND judge has declared that no couple should marry on an income of less than $100 a month.

Here is where Cupid is put out of business. The little god is no auditor of accounts.

Really, income is the least important thing in happy marriage, and has been such ever since the red roses of love first began blooming in the human heart.

The things absolutely essential to the happy home are strangely few. Chief among them are labor and love. Neither of these costs money. But both of them often fly from it.

The world is full of want, but of actual starvation there is little. Want and need are by no means synonymous.

It is a nice question whether there are not more people who have more than is really good for them than people who have not enough. The greatest injuries and crimes against mankind and self today are committed by the ultra-rich.

The cost of living cannot be fixed by any standard. It ranges from $300 a year for some preachers of the Gospel to $300,000 a year for some gamblers in stocks; but home happiness is not in proportion to income.

The average income of families in the whole United States is less than $500 a year.

The Quest for Happiness

"I WOULDN'T have run away from home if I had ever been treated like other girls—if I had been allowed to have a little fun. I wanted a little happiness, and I had to go away from home to get it."

These are the words of a seventeen-year-old girl who ran away from home to the city, was arrested and sent back home.

She was only a slip of a girl, with an innocent face, well educated, honest-hearted.

It is only another of the many, many instances of the sorrowful mistake that both children and parents often make—a mistake which renders impossible that happiness for which we all are searching.

The simple story teaches a big lesson.

The home, of all places in the world, ought to be the source of truest happiness to parents and children alike. It ought to be pervaded by an air of perfect confidence and understanding.

But it too often fails in its mission, and its members are driven out into the world on a quest for what they think is happiness.

There is a volume of pathos in the simple statement of this young girl that she wanted happiness and that she had to go away from home to get it.

Heroism and Duty

"NEVER mind making me out a hero. I did my duty—that's all. It's all in the day's work."

This was said by a life-saver who, at the risk of his own life, saved three children and their nurse from drowning at a beach.

It was his duty to do it, and he did it. There was nothing heroic about it in his mind.

But history has given us a different estimate of heroism. All heroism that humanity has cared enough about to make record of and remember has been nothing more nor less than duty.

Every man has his particular part to play in this world's advancement. The men who have played their parts with exceptional completeness are the world's heroes.

To do one's duty is to do enough to merit the stamp of greatness. Nobody ever got that stamp justly by any other method.

Few of us really do our duty. When some man does do his duty he becomes conspicuous. He is an exceptional man because he "did his duty—that's all." That is precisely the reason he ought to be held up as a model. The man who does his duty, and does it as a matter of course, is the highest example of true manhood. From such we have to learn the greatest lesson of life.

Nikalgin, Conqueror of Pain

A MIRACLE of medical science and a messenger of mercy is nikalgin, the conqueror of pain. It was discovered by Gordon Edwards, a native of Milwaukee, a college graduate, an electrical engineer, a bond broker. Hearing that dentists had no anesthetic that was satisfactory, he went into his laboratory, and after extensive experimentation, found a solution which, sprayed on the surface, completely killed the pain. He realized that it would be of immense service in other forms of surgery, and went to the medical profession with it, but the doctors would not pay any attention to it. At last he got them to try it at the Vanderbilt clinic in New York, where it was pronounced a success. Edwards made as much of it as he could carry and took it to England in 1914 to apply to the wounded. The doctors brushed him and his discovery away, counting it almost an impertinence. He went to France, and after importunate pleading, he got them to try it with the wounded in the Verdun hospital. They gave him for trial their worst cases, men burned almost to death with liquid fire, who suffered such pain when the wounds were dressed that they often died with the agony. His remedy gave instant relief to the insufferable pain during the dressing of the wounds, and gave complete insensibility to pain in all operations performed. He was too poor to make large quantities of his remedy for donation to the public, but Miss Anne Morgan, who had gone to Paris to aid the French, provided him with the means, and he is now making his nikalgin for two armies, and pain will be eased, and hundreds of precious lives will be saved by it. Christ eases the pain, the intolerable agonies of life. He cures the angry, fatal wounds of the soul, and does it with his heart's blood. This fact the prophet thus states: "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed." (Isa. 53 : 5.)

Finishing the Capitol Frieze

A LARGE cagelike wooden structure suspended from the balcony in the rotunda of the Capitol in Washington attracts the attention of every visitor these days. In it works Charles Ayer Whipple of New York and Boston, finishing the famous Brumidi-Costaggini frieze. Mr. Whipple is working out his suggestion for the completion, and in such a manner that if Congress does not approve the work it can be erased or taken down. The episodes to be pictured by Mr. Whipple are the invention of the locomotive, the application of steam to travel and transportation, the development of electricity, the freeing of Cuba, the building of the Panama Canal and the development of the modern battleship and airplane. The Capitol rotunda frieze was started by Constantine Brumidi, who carried the work to "Penn's Treaty with the Indians." After his death, Filipo Costaggini carried out the idea, his last group representing the discovery of gold in California. Costaggini died in 1907, and since then no work has been attempted on the frieze. No nation ever had such a rapid or magnificent progress as ours has had, and this record of that progress is eminently fitting. All through these art representations, the eye of faith can read the words, "What hath God wrought!" There is this reference to the art decoration of the temple, which was the capitol of the Jewish nation. "Even to the artificers and builders gave they it, to buy hewn stone, and timber for couplings, and to floor the houses which the kings of Judah had destroyed." (II Chron 34 : 11.)

Fake Eggs Fool Emu

THE female emu is the head of the house. She is larger, stronger, and more pugnacious than the male. She will lay the eggs, but will have nothing to do with them after they are laid. She says to her mate, "Now, I have done my part toward the next generation; if you want a family you can make a nest and hatch the chickens, for I won't." And he minds what the boss says, and makes the nest and raises the brood. A mother emu, a bird standing five feet high, with a kick strong enough to break a man's leg, laid an occasional egg in the bird corral at the Bronx Zoo in New York City. She paid no attention to them; did not even take the pains to deposit them in a likely or safe place; just left them on the bare floor, anywhere she might be when egg-laying time came. The keeper had to take the eggs up from the hard floor to keep them from being destroyed. So he got a large stone in the shape of an emu egg, and painted it a light green to look like the real article, and so Mr. Emu turned it over and over, and covered it up with straw to protect it and keep it warm. After several trials, a nest was prepared that suited the bird, and he settled himself down on five stone eggs to his six or seven weeks' vigil. One by one the stone eggs were subtracted from the nest and their places supplied by the real eggs, which had been saved, and the other day the father bird came off the nest with three healthy striped chicks, which he will raise as an ordinary mother bird would care for her brood. If these emus had been in their native wild in Australia, they would have scooped out a hole in the sand for a nest and taken turns in sitting on the eggs, the male bird having the chivalry of taking the night watch, leaving the day watch to the female. Then poor care would have been taken of the youngsters hatched; they would have been left to scratch gravel for themselves. From the earliest times, the ostrich family has been charged with taking very poor care of its offspring. Its unmotherly instinct is thus referred to: "Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in dust, and forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them." (Job 39 : 14, 15.)

Wood Alcohol Kills Six

SIX men died in Bellevue and St. Vincent's Hospitals in New York on October 30, after drinking wood alcohol sold to them as liquor. An Italian saloon-keeper said he bought four large jugs and several large bottles for $46. He put the stuff in flasks and sold them to his customers for 50 cents apiece. The men in separate places being seized with a fatal illness made a sensation, and the policemen and detectives soon traced the cause of the killings to the wood alcohol sold. The proprietor of the saloon was arrested on a charge of homicide, and his more than 100 flasks of the deadly poison were confiscated. All alcohol made from corn, rye, barley, grapes or any other food product is poison. It does not do its work of death quite so quickly, but if its use be persisted in it does it just as surely as the wood alcohol poison. The police arrest the man for selling the wood alcohol on the charge of murder, and permit the saloon keeper to murder the citizens with their poisonous liquor, and a civilized Christian community gives these murder mills license to grind out their grist of death. It throws up its hand in horror at the sudden killing in the Italian joint with wood alcohol, and then, by the license system, becomes a partner in the murder of a hundred, a thousand times more persons by the deadly alcohol in the ordinary brand of liquor. Is it any wonder that the states and the capital of the nation have gone dry, and that the rest of the country is following their example? The sudden death of these poor victims of wood alcohol, and the slower death of the 100,000 from ordinary liquor, emphasizes the great truth that "The wages of sin is death." (Rom. 6 : 23.)

Strawberry King Dead

HENRY JEROLAMAN, eighty-two years old, who died the other day at his home in Hilton, New Jersey, was known as the "Strawberry King." He prized as one of his most valuable possessions a letter from Queen Victoria addressed to "Henry Jerolaman, Strawberry King, United States of America, Province of New Jersey." Mr. Jerolaman devoted a number of years to experimenting with the strawberry with a view to increasing its size and improving its flavor. He eventually produced a plant which bore berries of unusual size the year round. Under the magic spell of man's skill, the plants and fruits seem to obey his bidding. Fruit culture is a primitive industry. We thus read of it in the earliest history of the race: "And in process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord." (Gen. 4 : 3.)

Toadstools for Mushrooms

MRS. CATHERINE CAMPOMENOSI and her husband, of Newark, New Jersey, partook heartily of a mess of mushrooms, as they thought; but it was toadstools they ate, and the wife died at the hospital from the poison, and the husband is in a critical condition there. This fatal mistake is made so often that many people will not touch mushrooms under any circumstances. There are toadstools in the mental and moral realm. Books that seem bright and inspiring, companions who seem winsome and attractive, amusements that seem innocent and charming, actions that seem proper, but have the element of poison and death in them. It is wisest to be on the safe side and to leave questionable books, friends, amusements, and actions alone. There is this account of the mistake made in gathering a poisonous for an edible plant: "They cried out, and said, Thou man of God, there is death in the pot. And they could not eat thereof." (II Kings 4 : 40.)

Harvesting the Red Apples

By

Earle William Gage

FOR generations America has held the reputation as the home of the juiciest, biggest, crispest red apples. It is within the past decade that raising apples of commercial varieties for shipment across the continent and to foreign countries has been possible. The depletion of the famous orchards of Europe has meant a new significance to the American grower, who for a generation to come must supply the demands of the French consuming public, whose orchards were marvels of productive capacity. The fact that we exported $36,476,163 worth of fruit and nuts to Europe in the past year, in spite of the war and shortage of ships, is indication of the part the American fruit-grower is destined to play in satisfying Europe's hunger for luscious fruit.

Apple-growing in America dates back to the time of the Indians. Some of the old apple-trees still remain in New York regions, but most of them were cut down by General Sullivan during his raid in 1779. Tradition states that four miles west of Geneva, N. Y., on the farm of Nathan White, a small nursery of sprouts was established in 1792, among the stumps of an old Indian orchard. On this site and from these sprouts an orchard later grew and flourished. And so Ontario County, New York, has been the birthplace of several varieties of our most cherished apples. The Tolman originated on the farm of Thomas Tallman, near Geneva, one of the early settlers, who planted seeds from an Indian orchard. Norton's Melon, a fruit of excellent quality, though delicate and somewhat difficult to propagate, originated about 1800 in the orchard of a Mr. Chapman, of East Bloomfield. The Northern Spy, an apple occupying a high place in the list of apples of commercial importance, originated in the same orchard. The valuation of New York's apple crop amounts to approximately $14,000,000 per season, and there is an increased interest in apple-growing.

THIS Mr. Chapman's name occupies an important place in our American history, for he is known as "Johnny Appleseed, the Apostle of Apple-Growing." More than a hundred years have passed since Johnny Appleseed scattered apple seeds throughout a wide range of territory from Pennsylvania to the Mississippi country, and in humility, yet his name has been immortalized, and we of future generations will be a long time forgetting the name of this great father of the modern apple-growing industry. Johnny Appleseed, whose real name was John Chapman, was born in Springfield, Mass., in the year 1775, eventful in American history in more ways than one. About the year 1801 he emigrated from Massachusetts, joining those forces starting for the yet unknown Western country. In the territory between Massachusetts and Ohio, and as far as Indiana, Mr. Chapman was a familiar figure. He foresaw the tide of migration going to the West, and, seeing the need of fruit, devoted his life to its culture. Gathering all the apple seeds he could secure in his native state he would make long trips West, planting the seed and supplying the scattered settlers with enough to provide them with dependable orchards. The result was thousands of producing apple orchards throughout this vast territory.

The apple industry in the United States today represents a stupendous commercial achievement. It had grown to 69,000,000 barrels in 1896; it dropped 28,000,000 in 1911, and went up again to 40,000,000 barrels in 1912. From this date forward there is a continual increase in the production, for the great cities of the world are crying for apples, and people everywhere are just beginning to apprehend the actual value of this delicate fruit. We are turning backward to our heritage, for in the days of our great-grandfathers the common adage was, "An apple a day will keep the doctor away." Fruit as a part of the diet represents a most health-giving element.

WITHOUT going into statistics deeply regarding apple-growing in our country, be it said that the recent census showed upward of 150,000,000 trees in bearing and more than 65,000,000 trees that will come into bearing within a few years. In this connection it is interesting to note that the geographic division of the country designated as the East North Central (comprising the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin) leads all other divisions in this respect, the number of trees in bearing in these states being reported as follows: Ohio, 8,504,886; Indiana, 5,764,821; Illinois, 9,900,627; Michigan, 7,534,343; Wisconsin, 2,430,332.

The figures for trees not in bearing in this region range from one million to three million per state. In productive value of the crop, however, this division is second to the Middle Atlantic division, rated as the most ideal apple-growing section in the world. This division includes the great apple states of New York, with nearly 14,000,000 trees, and Pennsylvania, with more than 10,000,000 trees. Fruit-growing in New York has assumed such large proportions and has been pursued so long that it is away beyond the experimental stage. There is no state where conditions are more favorable or where the industry is so firmly established.

So great has the apple industry loomed in New York that the fruit production of this one state represents a value more than $2,100,000 greater than the total valuation of the sub-tropical fruits produced in the United States. New York has a total of 24,988,707 orchard trees, which produce nearly 30,000,000 bushels of fruit, valued at $17,988,894. New York ranks third, exceeded by California and Missouri in number of trees. New York ranks second in bushels of fruit produced, exceeded by California by about 2,000,000 bushels, because of the immense prune industry of the latter state. On her 14,076,718 apple-trees New York produces more than 25,500,000 bushels of apples valued at $14,000,000. And New York ranks first in the value of apples, first in bushels produced, and second in number of trees. Missouri ranks first in number of trees, with nearly 18,000,000 trees, but with a production of less than 10,000,000 bushels, which enforces the statement that New York is the Empire Apple State of the Union.

In the great fruit belts along Lakes Erie and Ontario and the Finger Lakes and the Hudson Valley fruit-growing is becoming highly specialized. The apple area over the United States is limited. Ten acres devoted to apples is worth more from the profitable side than one hundred acres of land devoted to general farming operations. Modern cold storage facilities, which obviate the crops being put on the market within a limited time, and refrigerator cars, which allow it to be distributed all over the world, are giving the apple-growers new and better markets every year.

Medford and Ashland, in Jackson County, Oregon, which is better known as the Rogue River Valley fruit belt, are the cities most renowned as distributing centers for Oregon's fruit. The practical salesmanship methods employed by the fruit exchange of this section has caused the veneration of the Englishman for his king and his roast beef to yield space for the Yellow Newtown Pippin grown in Rogue River Valley. The best Yellow Pippins grown on earth are produced in this valley. The chief varieties of apples grown in Rogue River Valley are Newtown and Spitzenberg. The record yields of the two varieties are 592 boxes of Newtowns and 520 boxes of Spitzenbergs to the acre. The former variety brings from $2.50 to $3 per box, and the latter from $2.75 to $3.25. It is not, therefore, excessive to state that apples under scientific cultivation and care may be made to produce a profit of $800 per acre.

The increase in fruit production in Rogue River Valley for the past six years has been more than 1,000 per cent. No other fruit district of the world can show so remarkable a gain in so short a time. More than 1,200 cars of fruit are annually shipped from Medford and Ashland. Compared with the vast area of the Golden State, Jackson County shipped more than one-sixth as many cars of fruit as California. The annual fruit checks which the growers of this region receive in return for their fruit reach above the million-dollar mark.

There have been years when Jackson County placer mines returned many millions, but the gold once removed from the earth leaves little for future generations to rely upon for financial support. Not so with permanent agriculture, for when the million-dollar apple crop has been shipped to the people of the world the agricultural wealth has not been depleted but increased in value.

If the entire fruit crop of Jackson County were lined up in one railroad train of refrigerator cars, this train would be more than ten miles in length.

The success indicated by these facts and figures has been brought about by the energy, thrift and foresight of the fruit-growers of this region. Jackson County fruit-growers as a whole have used the very best judgment in adopting scientific methods in all their horticultural practice and salesmanship.

A Little Gold Dollar

SOME time ago a reader of this paper in Spirit Lake, Iowa, sent to the Christian Herald a gift of an old, worn gold piece—a dollar—which she had treasured during a long lifetime in memory of the giver. It was to her a very precious keepsake, yet the story of the sufferings of the widows and orphans of the war had so touched her heart that she concluded her keepsake could be put to no better purpose than to help relieve the distress of some poor afflicted soul, or perhaps keep some family alive. It would buy food, and that would mean life and hope, for a little while at least. Her gift went for the purpose indicated, and her example has not been lost upon others.

M. M. B., Tarkio, Mo., writes: "I saw in the Christian Herald the notice of a reader sending you for relief work a gold dollar which she had kept for sixty years. I have a gold dollar about sixty years old, which was given to me about the time gold dollars became scarce; and I know of no better use to which this dollar could be put than helping the helpless. Could we not start an Old Gold Dollar Fund and keep track of the history of each?"

Still another letter comes to us from Mrs. W. G. D., Pittsburg, Pa., and the writer says: "This clipping from the Christian Herald (of the Iowa reader's gift) reminded me of a gold dollar of my own which I treasure on account of associations connected with it. I, too, do not wish it to lie idle any longer. It will help a little; I wish it might help more. If you should add this item to the other, it may remind some one else of gold that is lying by and of the good it might do. God bless the Christian Herald for all the good it is enabled to do through its readers."

There is far more than the usual sacrifice connected with these three gifts. Each of these gold pieces has a story of its own; yet we question whether anything that has ever been accomplished through the use of those golden coins, since they first left the mint, new and shining, could equal in real value and importance what they will do now that they are started out on their mission of relief. Certainly, they could have been put to no nobler purpose.

A Friend of the Children

VERY wise and generous was the gift by the late Nancy A. Coffman of Mount Sterling, Ill., who passed away some time ago. The bequest reads:

"I give, devise and bequeath to the Christian Herald the sum of $1,000, the same to be used and expended by it to the best advantage and in its discretion, in the assistance of worthy poor boys and girls, and for their training and improvement, to the end that they may lead good, earnest Christian lives."

The legacy has been paid through John F. Regan, administrator, and will be applied in accordance with the wishes of the testator, who was a warm friend and patron of Christian Herald charities during her lifetime, and took a deep interest in Mont-Lawn and its wonderful work among the children of the poor.

Gifts to Good Causes

A FEW weeks ago Dr. Eli S. Reinhold of Crozer Theological Seminary, Chester, Pa., notified the Christian Herald of a legacy of $1,040.11 from the estate of the late Benjamin Walborn of Mahanoy City, of which he is the executor. It was Mr. Walborn's wish that this money should be paid over to the Christian Herald after his death, to be applied to India missions, orphanage work, education or other mission purposes (of which the late Mr. Walborn had been a generous patron during his lifetime), as his executor might determine. The money has been received, and, with the approval of the executor, apportioned as follows: Rev. R. A. Hume, Congregational Mission, Ahmednagar, $260.11; Rev. A. A. McBride, Congregational Mission, Sirur, $260; Rev. R. A. Wilson, Presbyterian Mission, Borsad, $260; Rev. E. Bullard, Kavali, $260. Checks for these amounts have been forwarded to the beneficiaries.

The late E. L. Divine of Waupaca, Wis., left a legacy of $260 to the Christian Herald, to be applied to some deserving charity. Check for this amount was received from the executor, Mr. L. F. Shoemaker, and has been forwarded to the Bowery Mission, to be used in its charity work.

A gift of $200, from the estate of the late Betsy P. Nichols, Fredonia, N. Y., has been divided, in accordance with the wishes of the testator, equally between the Christian Herald Children's Home and the Bowery Mission.

Through Mr. George W. Smith, executor of the estate of the late Mary L. Howard, of Corona, N. Y., a bequest of $1,020.75, which Mrs. Howard left for the Christian Herald Children's Home, has been received and forwarded to the treasurer of that institution.

From the estate of the late Martha Tefft, Cattaraugus, N. Y., a bequest of $199.75, for the Christian Herald Children's Home, has been received.

These timely and generous remembrances by friends who have passed away are received with appreciation by the beneficiary organizations.

Anonymous Giving

A FRIEND in New Mexico, who desires to remain unknown, writes to the Christian Herald enclosing a draft for $495, with the request that we apply it as follows:

Bibles and Christian Heralds for our soldiers and sailors	$ 20
War Widows' and Orphans' Relief Fund	50
Orphanage at Sendai, Japan (pledge)	75
Orphanage at Okayama (pledge)	75
Orphanage at Kolapur, India (pledge)	75
M. E. Mission, Inhambane, East Africa (pledge)	180
Bowery Mission	20
	$495

These amounts will be forwarded by the Christian Herald as indicated in the donor's letter. This is one of many instances in which the doer of good works prefers that his left hand should not know what his right doeth, remembering that "He that seeth in secret shall reward thee openly."

A Sacrifice for Sympathy

A READER of this paper in Morrisville, N. Y., writes: "Enclosed find check for the relief of the Armenians. I read in the Christian Herald your plea for their help. Am sorry I cannot send more. I am a poor man with a large family to take care of. I have been saving for a suit of clothes for myself, but I feel for those poor people and hope and pray that God will soon deliver them from their terrible affliction."

Gifts to Europe's Sufferers

IT was one time my privilege to have charge of the Christian Herald Orphanage at Chinkiang, China, and also to spend ten days in Kiangsu province distributing relief which the United States transport Buford brought over to us, and it now gives me pleasure to send you on behalf of some of my friends two small drafts, one for $20 and one for $3.45, which kindly accept to be used for War Relief in Europe

In making out receipt or voucher, please make it to the Joseph Methodist Episcopal Church or to me. I have been a steady reader of the Christian Herald for six years.

evil a government the absolute despotism of the Czar really was. The peasants believed in the Czar, and were convinced that he was a benevolent master, who provided an army for defense against enemies, and that they must till the soil and pay him taxes in return for this defense. They believed that the Czar loved his people and protected them, and if at times the officials bore too heavily it was because they deceived the Czar. They felt sure that if the Czar realized this, he would discharge the dishonest chinovniks and be a good father to them.

Thus did the credulous peasants regard the despot who held them subject to his slightest whim. But I told them the truth and tried to make it clear that the Czar not only knew of their sufferings but actually directed their oppressors. The people felt that I was mistaken, yet they listened politely, and none offended me by so much as a rude word.

I WAS not the only one who visited the country villages. Three thousand young people went at that time among the people in thirty-six governments telling them repeatedly of conditions and trying to awaken in them the desire for a free life. But the government learned of our activities and began to arrest us and put us in prison, while many were sent to exile and hard labor in Siberia.

In 1874 I was arrested, quite by accident. I was tramping through the districts of Kiev, Podolsk, Chernigoff and Cherson, and had in my bundle some detailed maps of the places through which I was journeying, as I did not want to risk suspicion through constantly asking my way. When I stopped with peasant families they did not look into my bundle and had no idea who I was. But one day, when I stopped at Tulchino in the district of Podolsky, a woman looked into my bundle and found my maps. For one who cannot read, any printed slip of paper is a cause for suspicion and curiosity. That was especially true then. It was evident that the servant was much impressed by her discovery. That very day, she went to the chief of the district police to work on his kitchen garden, and she told him all about it.

The chief of police was worried and hurried off to find me. Suspecting nothing, I was walking home from the market with some bread, a couple of apples and a piece of bacon. All of a sudden I noticed the Stanovoy Pristav, hurrying up in his carriage. He shouted to me.

"Get into the colyaska."

Immediately I understood what it meant, got in and kept silent. We entered the hut.

"Where are the things of this woman?"

"She has no baggage, but here is her bundle," answered the landlord.

"Give it to me."

He opened the bundle, and there were not only my maps but revolutionary proclamations as well. That, of course, meant the end of my work there.

The Stanovoy was an inexperienced fellow—a mere simpleton. He took the revolutionary documents and read them aloud in the presence of all. The peasants had listened and said,

"At last we hear the truth. This is the very manifesto that the nobles have concealed from us."

Then the attorney arrived, and both read the proclamation aloud once more. Meanwhile a large group of eager peasants had gathered. They learned my proclamation by heart.

The Ispravnik, who was the highest resident police official, was informed. He understood at once what it was all about, and I was sent to prison.

AT that time woman propagandists were unheard of. From pure fright at such an unusual specimen, the head of the Brazlovsky prison found it necessary to put me into a dark dungeon at once and to fetter my hands. A whole month I was dragged about from one provincial prison to another, until at last the gendarmes appeared, rescued me from the hands of the police and took me to Kiev prison.

From Kiev I was taken to Moscow, and finally I was placed in a prison in Petrograd, where we were tried after having been kept in solitary confinement for four years. This confinement had very serious results. Out of the three hundred prisoners, only one hundred and ninety-three lived through to the time of the trial, and of these thirty-seven were women. During the entire time I gave no evidence, and was sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

There was nothing horrible in that. Nothing is horrible and one fears nothing if he believes he is doing the right thing.

My strong constitution and mature age helped me to bear and endure privation and hardship for many tedious years, while the youthful and tender comrades very soon fell ill. Death carried them away one by one, leaving in my heart a feeling of cruel wrong and great bitterness.

AFTER finishing my five years of katorga, sentence was already pronounced to exile me to Bargusin, in Transbaikal Siberia. But, together with three adventurous comrades, I started for the wooded hills, seeking liberty. We met with thousands of obstacles and dangers. Nicholas Sergeievich Tutcheff has described our dangerous flight, which ended in our being caught, after being lost amid unknown precipices and awful cliffs.

I, being an old katorzanka, was sentenced to four years more of penal servitude, together with forty lashes with the knout. I escaped this last cruelty, for the authorities feared that such treatment would cause an insurrection among the exiles; as was stated in the official paper of the governor of the Transbaikal district.

So it was that after a confinement of a year, I was compelled to serve my term of katorga once more and was sent to the Kara mines, which were at that time strewn with prisons for criminals as well as for political exiles. Both classes were perishing from zinga, typhus, and consumption without end. The common criminals suffered most, for no care whatsoever was taken of them, and they were kept in the most terrible conditions.

As for me, my second visit to the mines was something of a holiday. During my first visit there were no other women sentenced to penal servitude besides myself, for it had not yet become fashionable to send women to penal servitude in the mines. But now I found nearly a score of women friends, some of whom I had known before, and throughout the whole of my second period of katorga I was in the midst of the best society in the world.

Hard labor for eight months counted as a year of imprisonment, and the time passed by unnoticed. One thing only was almost too much to bear,—to see how the feeble gradually grew weaker and while in the prime of life slowly but surely approached death in the mines.

IN 1885 I found myself once more free from the mine prisons and penal servitude, but still exiled in a dead little town of Transbaikal, called Selenginsk. Here I spent eight years, and they were the saddest of my life. The great expanses of barren steppes, the poor huts and continual espionage by the police were my unhappy lot. I was cut off from the peasants I loved, and the officials would not give me a passport entitling me to go from place to place in Siberia. My heart burned with the hot desire to flee, to inauguarate a campaign against the enemy. I was wild with anger and the desire to avenge the ruined lives of the best daughters and sons of our country.

I struggled against every obstacle, but all was in vain. Nature was allied with my oppressors. The endless steppes of Transbaikal and Mongolia and broad Lake Baikal all stood in the way of my desires. There were no railroads and no shipping at that time. And here in the lifeless village of Selenginsk I suffered throughout eight interminable years, like a wild bird confined to a narrow cage.

Lonely, but always striving, I went out into the great open spaces of the steppes and in a loud voice poured forth across the wide expanse the endless longing of my wild heart for freedom and fellowship. Not a day went by but I thought of fleeing.

The eight empty years I dragged out in Selenginsk remained throughout my life as a gray blank that obliterated the consuming longing of my burning soul. I filled my time with work for money, so that I could send my meager earnings to my hungry, neglected comrades in their desert of snow. But I kept reading and studying, in order to keep informed as to how the world was living, and gaining in knowledge of how life could be made most worth the living.

"Be patient," I said to myself, when my fierce longing tore me; "endure to the end and you will attain the ideal of your years of thought."

In 1892, after remaining a peasant prisoner for four years, I was given a passport covering all of Siberia, and the day it came I set out from the place whose torture I had endured so long, with my face toward the border of Russia, so that I could enter it as soon as my term of exile was over.

I HAD been weakened by my life of privation and lonely longing. Anæmia and neuralgia sapped my vitality in Selenginsk. But the strong constitution which I had inherited soon reasserted itself, and during the last four years of my Siberian exile I traveled from town to town and had much opportunity to talk to young and old, so that I gained allies among the best citizens of Siberia. And when, in September, 1896, I returned to Russia, I found there many students, both men and women, with whom I had discussed the reviving of the old propaganda and slogans while we were in Siberia. They soon started plans, and to this day many of them remain true to the principles formulated then.

When I entered Russia on the first day it was permitted, I saw that another revolutionary movement was gaining strength. Marxism was rapidly claiming the attention of the young, and the old fighters were regarded as a spent force. But the belief in personality, in the goodness of the people and a consciousness of their needs and aims lent such confidence to my energy that I did not hesitate, but immediately plunged into practical work, following plans that had been ripening in my mind since the trial of the 193. In 1878 I had declared to the judges, "I have the honor of belonging to the Socialist Revolutionary Party of Russia, and am therefore unable to recognize the court of senators of the Czar."

Eighteen years had passed since that day, but my loyalty to the party of revolution and Socialism lived in me as fresh and hot as during the days of my arrest and trial. My confidence in the belief that the great masses of peasants, the fundamental strength of the whole state, would hear the voice of their friends and would not hesitate to follow their leadership,—this confidence made me hasten to lay the foundations for the Socialist Revolutionary Party, as it was named from the very beginning.

IT must be remembered that I returned from Siberia quite alone. I did not even know the addresses of those of my former comrades who had escaped annihilation during the sombre reign of Alexander III. I had no money, no revolutionary passport, and no means of knowing those who would be sympathetic toward my plans. It took a long time, much care and patience, before my restless, modest travels through Russia definitely resulted in making acquaintances and a possibility for active work.

More and more the peasants showed a readiness to join the organization, and in the fifth year all the committees recognized a single center. The rapid increase in membership and extension of its work soon attracted the attention of the government of the Czar.

In 1903 the party sustained a serious raid, and arrests deprived it of many prominent workers. Our best printing-presses and stores of literature were seized. It was necessary to reestablish all this. Meanwhile, the activity of the party was growing abroad, thanks to our talented and energetic emigrants, who were working with might and main to edit the party organs, "Viestnic Revolutzee" and "Revolutzionnaya Rossia," as well as many books and leaflets for the people. These revolutionary workers gathered about them many young people who sought knowledge of the theory and practice of the party in order to work among the people and for them.

I went abroad for the first time in order to induce the young people to return home to work for the revolutionary cause. In May, 1903, I boarded a steamer, and, accompanied by a smuggler, I crossed Rumania and Hungary to Geneva in Switzerland, where there was a center for party workers whose activities were spread abroad into Paris and London. At this conference we were joined by the veterans of the seventies, Leonid Shishko, Felix Volchovsky, Egor Lasareff, Nicholas Chaikovsky.

YOUNG people eagerly frequented our meetings, both lectures and discussions, and listened attentively to our orators. Victor Chernoff, the editor-in-chief of our central organs, was successfully protecting our party from the attacks of our opponents. He also explained fully the revolutionary theory, which had for its scientific basis the philosophical teachings of Chernishevsky, Lavroff, and Michailovsky.

My own part was convincing the young people that the time had come for active work, to propagate the ideas which they had made their own among the peasants and workingmen, to organize all the forces that were able and willing to start a fight with the old régime, all those, in short, who were prepared to give their lives for freedom in Russia.

And then began a vast tide of young men and women streaming back to Russia, a smuggling in of revolutionary literature on a large scale—and booklets with the inscription, "v borbie obrietyosh ti pravo svoyo," ("Right conquers only through fighting") were flooding the towns and villages of Russia. Hundreds of other young people were pouring forth to Switzerland, there to drink from the well of living water, and others, who had acquired the necessary knowledge and instructions in Switzerland, went into the darkest corners of Russia with their message of light.

Month by month the tide increased in power, and one might well have thought that Young Russia was resolved to give its strength for the benefit of Russia's millions. This work of directing the youthful vigor of Russia took me two years. But during that period I was also in America, where the friends of freedom had called me.

From America I was in a position to forward much money for the expenses of our party, chiefly for the literature, for which the transportation to Russia was very expensive. In the United States I acquired many friends, true and devoted to me ever since. They have rendered ample proofs of their sincerity by overwhelming me with their kind attention to all my needs during the years of my last imprisonment and exile. From 1907 to the present time they have not left off taking a deep interest in me for a single week.

AS soon as I heard of the first open fight in 1905, I once more crossed the frontier back to my homeland, but this time on foot, accompanied by two smugglers, one of the peasant class and one from the intelligencia. With us there was a comrade carrying a store of dynamite.

This was the first Russian Revolution waking and summoning to an unequal fight the whole of Russia.

My friends and comrades, you yourselves remember the events of those three years. The fight at last approached its end and the banners of revolution were being folded together here and there awaiting the next upheaval of spirit and power. The executioners were already hanging, shooting and torturing the best fighters for freedom, but my soul was far from

JOHNSON'S

FREEZE-PROOF

Prevents Frozen Radiators

THE only way you can be positively sure that your radiator won't freeze up is to use a non-evaporating anti-freeze preparation. You can never be sure of Alcohol or any other product which evaporates with the water.

Does Not Evaporate or Steam

Johnson's Freeze-Proof does not evaporate with the water. One application is sufficient for the whole winter unless the solution is weakened by leakage of the radiator or hose connections, through the over-flow pipe or by boiling water.

Absolutely Harmless

Johnson's Freeze-Proof does not injure rubber, cloth, packing or metal of any kind. It does not rust or corrode metal. There is less rust with Johnson's Freeze-Proof than there is with water alone or with a combination of water and alcohol.

Economical and Easy

Johnson's Freeze-Proof is the most economical anti-freeze compound on the market. It is very easy to use—simply dissolve in water and pour into the radiator. One package is sufficient to protect a Ford to 5° below zero; for large cars use two packages to protect to 5° below zero; and three packages to protect to 20° below zero.

Raises the Boiling Point of Water

The boiling point of water is 212°. The boiling point of alcohol is 131°. The boiling point of Johnson's Freeze-Proof and water is from 225° to 250° depending upon the amount of Freeze-Proof used.

For Gas and Stationary Engines

At the close of a day's work it isn't necessary to drain the jacket of your engine—Johnson's Freeze-Proof will prevent the water from freezing in the coldest weather. You need have no hesitancy about using it in your stationary or gas engine, tractor or automobile for it is absolutely harmless. One package will prevent 3½ gals. of water from freezing at 5° below zero.

Insist upon your dealer supplying you with Johnson's Freeze-Proof. It is readily procurable as practically all jobbers have it in stock. Johnson's Freeze-Proof is put up in packages containing 6½ lbs. net which retail at $1.50 each in U. S. A. If your dealer cannot supply you, we will fill your order direct by prepaid Parcel Post to points in U. S. A., East of the Rockies.

conquered. My heart was full of hope and I thrust myself into the thick of events.

After the dissolution of the second Duma I hoped for a new outburst of indignation on the part of the people. But evidently they were still drinking the cup of hesitation and doubt and were meditatively looking into the future, afraid to venture again with their weakened forces.

In those days of depression on one side and needless severity on the other, I was arrested in Samara. This time it seemed that the police would not let me leave their hands alive. But in my heart I knew better.

During the two years and nine months that I was imprisoned in the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul I did not think of death, but my thoughts ran ahead to the time when Russia, after the inevitable second revolution, determined and successful, would start constructive work and in a few years would transform our unhappy land and our ignorant masses into an educated, enlightened state, which might serve as an example to all other nations in respect to culture and the welfare of its citizens.

I HAD pictured the events in the history of this New Russia in such bright colors that even now, living through what has developed from a child of my imagination to a living reality, there seems to be a strange continuity between the ideal of my dreams and the actuality that has so suddenly taken form.

My confidence in the possibility of seeing my country free, my people flourishing in contentment and spiritual development, has borne me up and lent wings to my strength. I was conscious that I would still be able to work for my people, and I felt depressed at being forced to waste time in exile. There, in the wild Siberian forests, I once more planned to flee, as I was anxious to unite in the work of my party comrades, who were calling me to their side. Once more my attempt to escape was a failure.

Only two hours separated me from a place of safety which was my longed-for destination, and it was a source of great disappointment, a terrible misfortune that after having driven a thousand versts in the cold of winter I found myself helpless in the hands of my enemies.

Again I knew that they would not forgive me for trying to gain my freedom and again to enlist in revolutionary work. But even then, I felt such vitality welling up in my breast that I could not endure the thought of ceasing my activity.

"I shall live through it all," an inner voice kept whispering to me. "I shall endure through every trial and live to see the bright advent of freedom's day."

FROM Yakutsk I was transported to Irkutsk and here was renewed all the persecution and torture that had marked my stay in Kirensk. I became ill, and though I noticed how the doctors tried to conceal from me the seriousness of my condition, it seemed strange to me that they could believe that I would die, when my soul was conscious of the fact that I was not approaching death but a far different issue—a victorious revolution.

The longer the war lasted, the more terrible were its consequences, the clearer became the perfidy of the government and the more certain it became that a growing consciousness leading toward democracy in all the nations was inevitable. All this meant the approach of our revolution.

I waited to hear the glad ringing of the bells of Russia, announcing freedom throughout the land, and I wondered why they did not burst forth with their glad message. Yet, last November, when bursts of indignation followed one another in rapid succession and angry cries rang from one mass of population to another, I was already standing with one foot in a Siberian sledge, fearing that the snow would leave the roads before freedom came.

On the fourth of March, a telegram to Minusinsk announced to me my liberty. That very day I left for Achinsk, the nearest railway station. From Achinsk on, I was in uninterrupted contact with masses of soldiers, workmen, railway employees, students and those brave frontier women, so dear to me, who bear all the hardships of life in the dark interior of this great state.

Today my car is carrying me to Moscow and beyond. When my wanderings throughout this great country will cease, I do not know. Possibly the prophecy of my old friends will be fulfilled: "You will die on your marches." If this is true, blessed be my people with whom and for whom, God has given me opportunity and strength to work."

John Barleycorn Roughly Handled

THE recently elected governor of the state of Sonora, Mexico, General P. Elias Calles, is more determined than ever that his part of Mexico shall be "bone dry." The accompanying view shows his officers engaged in confiscating, breaking up, burning and casting into the Gulf of California at Guaymas, Mexico, many thousand bottles of mescal, wine, etc. An extract from a letter from G. W. Hopkins, an American friend who took this view, says: "I am enclosing some pictures of the destruction of $15,000 worth of liquor. It was found by Governor Calles out at the hacienda of San German. It belonged to Rodolfo Fierro and the Davila brothers. The latter escaped, but Rodolfo is in jail. The Los Angeles Times said three million dollars' worth was destroyed, but we would all have been drunk from the fumes had there been that much. As it was, I had a rather strong breath before I got all the views taken, and I was late getting there."

Let every one rejoice that the good work of rough-handling John Barleycorn is being extended into the neighboring republic of Mexico. His days verily are numbered, not only in the United States, but in America and all the wide, wide world. God speed the day!

For the Uplift of Camp Life

IT has been said that the war will be won, not in France, not on the plains of Italy, but in the training-camp towns of America. It will not be won there in battles against the German enemy, but in battles against enemies even more dangerous lonesomeness and immorality.

Among the first actions of the War and Navy Departments, at the outbreak of the war, was the appointment of commissions on training-camp activities. These commissions were later coordinated under the skilful leadership of Raymond B. Fosdick. These commissions adopted, right at the start, the policy of working through existing organizations; they have created little new machinery. Inside the camps the work which is to keep the men morally, mentally and spiritually fit is being done through the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus and the American Library Association. It is being well done. Outside the camp the work is being done through the Playground and Recreation Association of America.

The work inside is now pretty well organized and the organization is working well, and all it needs is money and men, both of which America is more than ready to supply. The work outside does not admit of such rapid organization, neither does it need so many men or so much money, but it does need some money; and it needs workers, thousands of them, who will help to create in the neighborhood of the camps the "home" atmosphere which will keep our boys from slipping, and which will send them abroad with hearts warmed, their spirits eager and courage high.

THERE has been a good deal of nonsense about the "lure of the uniform." There has also been a lot of sentimental "mothering" of the boys in khaki. Both these things are bad, because they are based on false notions. The men of the army are men like other men; they have come from just such homes as your own. They are the sons of praying mothers and upright fathers. They have been plucked out of the normal home life and set to learning a new way of life; they are becoming soldiers, but under the khaki and the olive drab they are still men. For many hours each week they are drilled and schooled and trained in the ways of the army. In other hours they are given free rein to rest and amuse themselves. While under discipline, the restraint is temporarily removed. That is the time when the man crops out in the soldier. He wants a change. He gets it to some extent in the Y. M. C. A. tents and "huts," but he is tired of the camp. He goes outside. He may find a welcome to wholesome environment, or he may find dangers. It is our task to determine which it shall be.

What the nation asks of us is twofold. If we live near a camp, it asks us to open our homes to the boys, to invite them, one, two, more if possible, to Sunday dinner or to some midweek evening meal. It asks us to open our churches, to get up concerts and social evenings for the boys. In other words, it asks us to supply the "home" atmosphere which they miss in the army, and doing this to help them to realize that somebody cares; that the country, whose battles they fight, has a heart.

THEY are asking one thing more of those who live near the camps and of those who live farther away. That is money. Not much money. Only $4,000,000 from the whole country to carry the work a year. A little over $3 apiece for each of the 1,250,000 men who will be in training in the camps. Perhaps the government might have appropriated this money, but it didn't, and anyway the government is only us in another form. Since it was not appropriated it must be given, and it will be. You who read this will give, and others will give, and the fund will be raised. What will be done with it?

In the neighborhood of each camp there will be erected or remodeled clubhouses and recreation centers for the men where they can secure such comforts of civilization as they desire. There will also be facilities for the entertainment of friends and relatives of the soldiers, and places where the soldiers can meet their friends. With these buildings as a center, a work will be developed which will make it possible for every man to enjoy his hours off duty without risking the dangers of indiscriminate acquaintance with those who will lead him astray. The soldier will be protected from exploitation and made to feel at home; accommodations will be found or provided for his relatives visiting the camp; drinking fountains and comfort stations will be provided; rest-rooms will be opened; the people of the communities will be encouraged to open their homes and lodges and churches and open-air meetings and band concerts; socials and receptions will be arranged. As many activities as possible will be set in motion to keep the men occupied, in order that they may develop a moral consciousness which will safeguard them when they go abroad, and a national consciousness which will mark them as the representatives of a nation of moral and upright citizens.

The work of the Commission on Training-Camp Activities has back of it the support of the President and of the War and Navy Departments. Men of big business are leaving their desks and throwing themselves into the organization of this work. John N. Willys has turned from making automobiles and airplanes to head the National Committee, and other leading men are doing their part. Some of them have guaranteed the cost of raising the $4,000,000 so that every cent given by the people of America shall go into the work for which it was given. The call is to you. Think hard, let your heart speak, and send your pledge or check to the treasurer, Charles H. Sabin, president Guaranty Trust Company, New York City.

is more than Rome, or even Babylon herself, considered as a single city, but the latter was the fountain-head, "the mother," of all the systems of idolatry which have cursed the earth since Nimrod's day.

Romanism is one of these, but only one. As Dr. Seiss says in his "Lectures on the Apocalypse," the wine of her fornication "was already bottled and labeled before the first dispersion," i.e., prior to the tower of Babel, as recorded in Genesis 11. In other words, there was idolatry before Rome, either pagan or papal. The Old Testament tells us of Moloch, and Ashtaroth, and Chemosh and Milcom, the gods of the nations round about, whose worship polluted Israel. These were the result of Babel, and under other names the same gods are affecting, if not controlling, the thinking, the legislating and the worshiping of all the nations of the earth today. Two-thirds of the people of the earth are still pagans, while the other third are largely Mohammedans, Jews, Romanists, infidels, Christian Scientists, Spiritualists, or adherents of some other tainted and anti-Christian faith. There is not one nation at this hour which does not embody and exhibit more of the spirit of Nimrod than the spirit of God. In other words, the same old Babylon and her daughters still bear rule over all the earth, and will continue to do so until Jesus comes.

It is this awful fact that gives such significance to the teaching of Scripture about the coming restoration of Babylon and her fall. That event is the logical conclusion of the history and the times of the Gentiles. "The civilization and the culture of the world will again become atheistic and man-centered, and having described a circle, its cradle (Babylon) will become its grave."

That is the inspiration of, and that is what gives impetus to, Christian missions. It is a time to make haste to "testify the gospel of the grace of God."

That Film on Teeth
Is What Wrecks Them
By Wm. M. Ruthrauff, A.B., A.M.
All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

You Must End It
To Preserve Your Teeth

We cannot preserve teeth, however we brush them, if we do not end the film.

That slimy film, which you feel with your tongue, causes nearly all tooth troubles. It resists the tooth brush, clings to the teeth, gets into crevices and stays. That is why millions find that daily brushing fails to save their teeth.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food particles which ferment and form acid. It holds that acid in contact with the teeth—the cause of all decay.

It forms an ideal breeding place for germs, which multiply there with tremendous rapidity. Many serious diseases are now traced to those germs. And pyorrhea is largely caused by these germs and by tartar.

Old methods of tooth brushing leave much of that film. That is why brushed teeth discolor and decay, why tartar forms, and why most teeth need a frequent dental cleaning.

But now there's a way to end that film—an easy, pleasant way. And we ask you, for your teeth's sake, to prove it by a one-week test.

The way is called Pepsodent.

Now An Easy Way

The film is albuminous. That fact suggested that the film could be removed through the aid of pepsin.

But pepsin—the digestant of albumin—must be activated, else it is inert. The usual activating agent is an acid, harmful to the teeth. So pepsin for long seemed barred.

But invention has discovered an activating method which does not harm the teeth. The claims have been certified by patent by five governments already.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, activated in this harmless way. It has been subjected, by able authorities, to three years of clinical tests. Now it seems well-proved that this invention solves the problem of clean teeth.

We ask you to prove this for yourself, by making a seven-day test. Send this coupon for a One-Week tube. Use it like any tooth paste. It is dainty and delightful.

Note how clean your teeth feel, how the slimy film disappears. Note how quickly your teeth whiten, showing that the film is gone.

It will bring you a new conception of clean teeth. It will show you that the film can be combated. After that you will not return to old methods, we believe.

Cut out the coupon now.

Does Red Meat Cause Rheumatism?

R. L. ALSAKER, M.D.

By R. L. ALSAKER, M.D.

Author of "Maintaining Health"

DEAR DOCTOR ALSAKER: I am 43 years old. For the past three years I have had occasional pains in the shoulder, the knee joints, and in the little finger of the left hand.

My doctor tells me that I have rheumatism and that I must stop eating meat—especially red meat—beef, lamb, etc. I eat very little meat. My breakfast consists of bacon and eggs or one mutton chop, rolls and occasionally wheat cakes (never more than three), or toast and a cup of coffee. And I eat a little fruit and oatmeal with cream and sugar. For lunch a couple of soft boiled eggs and a piece of pie or cake and a glass of milk. For dinner we have soup, a roast of some kind, or a broiled or baked fish, with potatoes and other vegetables, and occasionally a salad, and always a dessert.

If red meat causes rheumatism, why should I have it and the other members of the family, who eat meat as frequently as I do, be free? W. J. L.

THIS gentleman seems to think that he has been prudent about his eating, when in fact he has been careless. At 43 everybody owes it to himself and family to know how to eat so as to have health. Eggs, meat, fish and milk are proteids (albuminous foods). The body needs a limited amount of these foods, but if they are taken in excess, as they are when eaten at every meal, they build rheumatism, catarrh, bronchitis, asthma, colds, Bright's disease and other ills.

Colds are a warning, a danger signal, showing that the body is full of impurities and waste.

Pains that travel from joint to joint, usually called rheumatic pains, are another sign that the blood is charged with impurities.

Red meat does not in itself cause rheumatism, though overeating of meat often helps to build up trouble. I have to fall back on experience and say that I have had numerous cases of rheumatism of all kinds—gout, lumbago, muscular rheumatism, rheumatism of the joints, chronic and acute—and every case without exception has recovered, when they followed directions. Many of these patients had had rheumatism from ten to thirty years, during which time they had consumed vast quantities of drugs and had gone to springs and had been boiled out, without special benefit.

In only one case was meat taken away temporarily, yet all the rest recovered, so red meat does not cause rheumatism.

These sufferers recovered through proper living, especially through correct eating. If this gentleman will eat and drink as he should, he will recover, as all the rest did. There are no ifs and buts about it—he will get well and stay well. It is natural to be well, and those who follow Nature's laws will always have health. Proper eating is the most important, in fact the dominating, health factor. Every one who has rheumatism can eat his way out of it and into health. No one need be sick.

Rheumatism is a luxury, not a necessity. Those who get it can keep it indefinitely. They can also get rid of it and stay rid of it. Those who have rheumatism should not complain about it, for they have the knowledge at hand that will show them how to get out of the aches and pains of rheumatism and back to health.

Realizing the universal need of clearly defined instruction on the cause and cure of rheumatic troubles, I have outlined in a small volume a plan of living that has proved successful in getting rid of all kinds of acute and chronic rheumatism.

The plan shows you in plain English the true cause of rheumatism, and it gives you the true cure—a cure that works. It is simple, good workable common sense that you can apply right in your home. You need not go to health resorts or so-called healing springs. You need not take drugs or waters bearing fancy or unpronounceable names. Don't fool with drugs, but learn how to live so that your system will be so sweet and clean that you can have no aches and pains. A cure consists in living according to the natural demands of your body, in giving the body the proper care and especially in eating correctly.

The price of "Getting Rid of Rheumatism" (the title of this new book) is one dollar, with ten cents additional to pay for postage. Its cost is considerably less than your doctor would charge for prescribing a treatment—less than your druggist would charge you for a patent "cure-all" that doesn't cure—less than it would cost you to lose a day's pay on account of sickness. In fact this small investment will pay big dividends in health and happiness till the end of your days. Send one dollar and ten cents to my publisher, Frank E. Morrison, Dept. 86, 1133 Broadway, New York City, and get your copy. Follow my plan of treating rheumatism for one month, then if you are not entirely satisfied with the improvement in your health, return the book and your money will be refunded to you.

PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENT: R. L. Alsaker, M.D., is an eminent authority on the subject discussed in the above article. He has put the net result of his many years of professional experience with sick people into his writings, and it is a real pleasure for me to recommend them because I know from personal experience and observation that good results always follow an observance of his simple instructions. CHAPTER XXIII

BONNIE'S letter reached Mother Marshall Wednesday afternoon. Father Marshall hurried in from the barn to hear it read:

> YOU DEAR MOTHER MARSHALL! [the letter began] AND DEAR FATHER MARSHALL, TOO! I think it is just the most wonderful thing that I ever heard of that you are willing to invite a stranger like me to visit you! At first I thought it wasn't right to accept such great kindness from people I never saw, and who didn't know whether they could even like me or not. But afterward Mr. Courtland told me about your Stephen and that you had suffered, too! And then I knew that I might take you at your word and come for a little while to get the comfort I need so much! If I can really be of any comfort to you in your loneliness I shall be so glad. But I'm afraid I could never even half fill the place of so fine a son as you must have had. But if you will let me love you both I shall be so grateful. All that I had on earth are gone home to God now, and the world looks so long and hard and sad to me! I do hope you can love me a little while I stay, and that you will not let me make you any trouble.
> I am so glad that you know Jesus Christ. It makes me feel at home before I get there. My dear father was a minister.
> And I don't want you to feel that I am going to presume upon your kindness and settle down on you indefinitely. Just as soon as I get a chance to work I must take it, and I shall want to repay you for all you have done for me. You have sent me a great deal more money than I need.
> I start Wednesday evening on the through express. But don't worry about me; I'll find my way to you as soon as I can get there. I am praying all the time that I shall not disappoint you. And now till I see you,
> Sincerely and gratefully,
> ROSE BONNER BRENTWOOD.

"It couldn't be improved on," declared Mother, beamingly. "It's just what I'd have wanted her to say if I'd been planning it all out, only more so!"

Later that evening a telegram arrived:

> Miss Brentwood left tonight at nine-fifteen on express number ten. Please let me know if she arrives safely.
> PAUL COURTLAND.

"Now isn't that thoughtful of him!" said Father, as he hung up the receiver.

"Isn't it funny, Father, we don't know how she looks!" said Mother next morning at breakfast. "And if two girls should get off the train at Sloan's station we wouldn't know which was the right one!"

"Well I should!" declared Father. "I'm dead certain there ain't two girls in the whole universe could have written that letter, and if you'd put any other one down with her, and I saw them side by side, I could tell first off which she was!"

They were both busy and excited up to the very last minute till it was time to start to Sloan's Station to meet the train.

Mother would go along, of course. She pictured herself standing for hours beside that kitchen window with her cheek against the old hat, waiting, and wondering what had happened that they hadn't come, and she couldn't see it that way. So she left the dinner in such stages of getting ready that it could soon be brought to completion, and wrapped herself in her big gray cloak.

Father went faster than he had ever been known to go since he got the car, and Mother never even noticed.

Mother Marshall sat quite decorously in the automobile till the train drew up to the platform and people began to get out. But when Bonnie stepped down from the car she forgot all about her doubts as to how they would know her, and jumped right out on the platform without waiting to be helped. She rushed up to Bonnie, saying, "This is our Bonnie, isn't it?" and folded her arms about the girl, forgetting entirely that she hadn't meant to use the name until the girl gave her permission. Bonnie was so glad to hear her own name called in that endearing tone that she just put her face down in Mother Marshall's comfortable neck and cried.

"Oh, you are so good to me!" sobbed Bonnie, with a smile through her tears. "I know I'm acting like a baby, but I can't seem to help it. I've had nobody so long, and now to be treated like this, I just can't stand it! It seems as if I'd got home!"

"Why, sure! That's what you have!" said Father in his big, hearty voice.

"Put your head right down on my shoulder and cry if you want to, my pretty!" said Mother Marshall. "You can't think how good it is to have you here! Father and I were so afraid you wouldn't come!"

WHEN they got to the house even Father was so far gone that he couldn't let them go up-stairs alone. He just had to leave the machine standing by the kitchen door and carry that little hand-bag up as an excuse to see how she would like the room.

Bonnie, pulling off her gloves, entered the room when Mother opened the door. She looked around bewildered a moment, as if she had stepped from the middle of winter into a summer orchard. Then she cried out with delight:

"Oh! How perfectly beautiful! You don't mean me to have this lovely room? It isn't right! A stranger and a pauper!"

"Nothing of the kind!" growled Father, patting her on the shoulder. "Just a daughter come home!"

Then he beat a hasty retreat to the fireplace and touched a match to the fire already laid, while Mother, purring like a contented old tabby, pushed the bewildered girl into the big flowered chair in front of the fire and began unfastening her coat and taking off her hat, reverently, half in awe, for she was not used to girls' fixings, and they held almost as much mystery for her as if she had been a man.

Mother Marshall was not sure, after all, but that she ought to have put Bonnie to bed and fed her with chicken broth and toast instead of letting her come down-stairs to eat stewed chicken, little fat biscuits with gravy, and the most succulent apple pie in the world, with a creamy glass of milk to make it go down.

Father had just finished trying to make Bonnie take a second helping of everything, when he suddenly dropped the carving-knife and fork with a clatter and sprang up from his chair:

"I declare to goodness, Mother, if I didn't forget!" he said, and rushed over to the telephone.

"Why, that's so!" cried Mother. "Don't forget to tell him how much we love her!"

Bonnie looked from one to the other of them in astonishment.

"It's that young man!" explained Mother. "He wanted we should telegraph if you get here all safe. You know he sent us a message after he put you on the train."

"How very thoughtful of him!" said Bonnie, earnestly.

Four hours later Courtland, coming up to his room after basket-ball practice, a hot shower, and a swim in the pool, found the telegram:

> Traveler arrived safely. Bore the journey well. Many thanks for the introduction. Everybody happy; if you don't believe it come and see for yourself.
> FATHER AND MOTHER MARSHALL.

Courtland read it and looked dreamily out of the window, trying to fancy Bonnie in her new home. Then he said aloud, with conviction, "Sometime I shall go out there and see!"

"How thankful I am for Sanatogen"

YOU'LL find them in almost every country of the world—women of just this type lifting their voices in earnest gratitude for the kindly benefits of Sanatogen.

—like Olive Schreiner, the gifted writer, in South Africa, who says: "Nothing that I have taken for years has given me such a sense of vigor as Sanatogen."

—and Mrs. Frances C. Tiernan (Christian Reid), the well-known author, who writes: "Of the many who have enthusiastically praised Sanatogen, no one has said too much, and I am glad, if only as a matter of gratitude, to add my testimony to the benefits derived from its use."

—and Lady Henry Somerset, in England, who sums up thus: "Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep, invigorates the nerves, restores the patient to health."

Sanatogen no doubt will help you when you are nervous and run down. It rebuilds the starved body-cells—nerve cells especially—bringing more restful sleep, keener appetite and the energy for more active days. Easily digested and assimilated by even the most delicate organisms, it is of special worth to expectant or nursing mothers, giving the vitality most needed at such critical times. Give Sanatogen the chance today to help you.

Send for "The Text Book on Sanatogen" giving full and interesting facts concerning Sanatogen and including actual signed statements from eminent medical authorities on its tonic and upbuilding value in many elements. This book is free. Address THE BAUER CHEMICAL CO., INC., 26F Irving Place, New York.

Sanatogen is sold at good druggists everywhere, in 3 sizes, from $1.00 up.

Just then some one knocked at his door and handed in a note from Gila.

DEAR PAUL:—Come over this evening. I want to see you about something very special.
Hastily, GILA.

CHAPTER XXIV

COURTLAND had firmly resolved that the next time he saw Gila he would tell her of his own heart experience with regard to the Presence. He realized that he must go carefully, and not shock her, for he had begun to see that all her prejudices would be against such an experience. He had only so shortly himself come from a like position that he could well understand her repugnance toward hearing anything about it. But he would make her see the whole thing just as he had seen it.

Now Gila had no notion of allowing any such recital as Courtland was planning. She had her stage all set for another scene, and she had on her most charming mood. She was wearing a little frock of pale-blue wool, o simple that a child of ten might have worn it under a white ruffled apron. The neck was decorated with a soft kerchieflike collar. Not even a pin marred the simplicity of her costume. Her hair, too, was simpler than usual, almost carrying out the childish idea with its soft looping away from the face. Little heelless black-satin slippers were tied with narrow black ribbons quaintly crossed and recrossed over the slim, blue-silk ankles, carrying out the charming idea of a modest, simple maiden. Nothing could be more coy and charming than the way she swept her long black lashes down upon her pearly cheeks. Her great eyes when they were lifted were clear and limpid as a baby's. Courtland looked at her with his heart in his eyes, and she drooped her lashes to hide a glint of triumph, knowing she had chosen her setting aright at last. Softly, dreamily, pleasantly, in the back of her mind floated the Capitol of the nation, and herself standing amid admiring throngs receiving homage. She was going to succeed. She had achieved her first triumph with the look in Courtland's eyes. She would be able to carry out Mr. Ramsey Thomas's commission and win Courtland to anything that would forward ambitious hopes for him! She was sure of it!

THE very important business about which she had wished to see Courtland was to ask him if he would be her partner in a bazaar and pageant that was shortly to be given for some charitable purpose by the society folks with whom she companioned. She wanted Courtland to march with her, and to consult him about the characters they should choose and the costumes they should wear.

As if she had been a child desiring him to play with her, he yielded to her mood, watching her all the time with delighted eyes, that anything so exquisite and lovely should stoop to sue for his favor. Of course he would be her partner! He entered into the arrangements with a zest, though he let her do all the planning, and heeded little what character she had chosen for him, or what costume, so she was pleased. Indeed, his part in the matter seemed of little moment so he might go with her—his sweet, shy, lovely maiden! For so she seemed to him that night! A perfect Solveig!

It was so he remembered what he had come to tell Gila. Looking down to that exquisite bit of humanity, a great tenderness for her, and longing, came over him, to make her know now all that the Presence was becoming to him.

"Gila," he whispered, and his voice was full of thrill, "There is something I want to tell you!"

She thought she knew what he was going to say. She thought she saw the lovelight in his eyes, and it was so dazzling it almost blinded her. It frightened her a little, too, like the light in no lover's eyes that had ever drawn her down to whisper love to her before.

"Gila, I have a story to tell you," he said. "Until you know it you can never understand me fully, and I want with all my heart to have you

Lift Corns Off With Fingers

Doesn't hurt a bit! Corns and calluses fall right off! Magic!

Few drops take all pain and soreness from corns instantly—costs few cents!

No humbug! Any corn, whether hard, soft or between the toes, will loosen right up and lift out, without a particle of pain or soreness.

Wonderful discovery by Cincinnati man

This remarkable drug is called freezone and is a compound of ether discovered by a Cincinnati man.

Ask at any drug store for a small bottle of freezone, which will cost but a trifle, but is sufficient to rid one's feet of every corn or callus.

Put a few drops directly upon any tender, aching corn or callus. Instantly the soreness disappears and shortly the corn or callus will loosen and can be lifted right off with the fingers.

Freezone doesn't eat out the corns or calluses but shrivels or rather loosens them without even irritating the surrounding skin.

Just think! No pain at all; no soreness when applying it or afterwards.

Few drops stop corn-pain

Women should keep freezone on their dressers and never let a corn ache twice.

understand me. It is something that has become a part of me."

She sat wondering, half fearful. A gleam of jealousy came into her averted face. Was he going to tell her about another girl? A fierce unreasoning anger shot across her face. She drew her slim little body up tensely and waited for the story.

COURTLAND told her the story of Stephen.

Gila listened fascinated, even up to the moment of the fire and the tragedy when Stephen fell into the flames. She shuddered visibly several times, but sat tense and still. She even was unmoved when Courtland went on to tell of finding himself on a ledge above the burning mass, creeping somehow into a small haven, shut in by a wall of smoke, and feeling that this was the end. But when he began to tell of the Presence, the Light, the Voice, the girl gave a sudden start and gripped her cold hands together. Almost imperceptibly she drew away from him, and turned slowly till she faced him, horror and consternation in her eyes, utter unbelief and scorn on her lips. But still she did not speak, still held her gaze on him and listened, while he told of coming back to life, the hospital walls, the strange emptiness, and the Presence; the recovery, and the Presence still with him; the going here and there and finding the Presence always before him and yet with him!

"He is here in this room with us, Gila!" he said.

Then suddenly Gila gave a spring away from him to her feet, uttered a wild scream of terror, and burst into angry tears!

Courtland sprang to his feet in dismay and instant contrition. He had made the horror of the fire too dramatic. He had not realized how dreadful it would be to a woman's delicate sensibilities. This gentle, loving girl had felt it all to her soul and her nerves had given way before the reality of it. He had been an idiot to tell the story in that bald way. He should have gone about it more gently. He was not used to women. He must learn better. Would she forgive him?

AND now he was trying to comfort and soothe her, as he would soothe a little child who had been frightened. Not only his handkerchief, but his hands were called into requisition to charm away those tears and comfort the pitiful little face that looked so streaked and pink and helpless there against his shoulder.

When he had drawn her down upon the couch again, with the sobs still shaking her soft blue-and-white frilly breast, her blue-black hair all damp and tossed upon her temples, and tried to tell her how sorry he was that he had put her through the horrors of that fire, she put in a quivering protest. It was not the fire. She shivered. It was not the horror and the smoke! It was not Stephen's death, nor the danger to himself. It was not any of those that had unnerved her! It was that other awful thing he had said: that ghostly, ghastly, uncanny, dreadful story of a Presence! She almost shrieked again as she said it, and she shivered away from him, as if there were still something cold and clammy in his touch that gave her the horrors.

A cold disappointment settled down upon him. She had not understood. He looked at her, troubled, disappointed, baffled. It was not possible, then, for him to bring her this knowledge that he wished so much for her to have. It was a thing that one could tell about to one's friends, but could not give to them. It was something they must take for themselves, must feel and see by themselves! With new illumination he turned to her and said in a voice wonderfully tender for a man so young:

"Listen, Gila! I have been clumsy in telling you! You cannot see it just from my poor story. But He will come to you and you shall see him for yourself! I will ask him to come to you as he has come to me!"

AGAIN that piercing scream, and with a quick, lithe movement, almost like a serpent, she slid from his side and stood quivering in the middle of the room, her eyes flashing, her body shrinking, both little hands clenched at her throat.

"Stop!" she cried. "Stop!" and screamed again, stamping her foot. "I won't hear such horrible things! I won't have any spirits coming around me! I won't see them! Do you understand? I hate that Presence, and I hate you when you talk like that!"

She had worked herself into a fine tantrum, but there was behind it all a horrible fear and shrinking from the Christ he had described, the shrinking of the naked soul in the garden from its God. The drooping, childlike eyes were wide with horror now; the sweet, innocent mouth was trembling with emotion. She was anything but Solveig-like. If Courtland caught a glimpse of the real Gila through it all he laid it to his own clumsy way of handling the delicate mystery of a girl's shy nature. He saw she was wrought up beyond her own control, and he was so far under the illusion that he blamed himself only, and set himself to calm her.

He coaxed her to sit down again, put his strong hand on her quivering one, marveling in tenderness at its smallness and softness. He talked to her in quiet, soothing tones, grave and reassuring. He promised he would talk no more about the Presence till she was ready to hear. He was leaning toward her in his strength, his arm behind her, his hand on her shoulder, with a sheltering, comforting touch when he told her this, as one would treat a little child in trouble and, suddenly, like the sun flashing out from behind the clouds, she lifted up her teary face and smiled, nestling toward him, her head falling down on his shoulder with a sigh like a tired, satisfied child, her face lifted temptingly so close, so very close to his.

IT was then that he did the thing that bound him to what followed. He stooped and laid his lips upon her warm little trembling ones and kissed her. The thrill that shot through him was like the click of shackles snapping shut about one's wrist; like the turning of the key in a prison-house; the shooting of the bolt to one's dark cell. He held her there and touched her soft hair with his finger-tips; touched her cool little forehead with his lips; touched her warm, soft lips again; but something was the matter. He felt the surging forces within him rise and batter at the gate of his self-control. He wanted to say, "Gila, I love you!" but the words stuck in his throat.

What had he done? Whence came this sense of defeat and loss? The Presence! Where was the Presence? Yes—there—but withdrawn, standing apart in sadness, while he sat comforting and caressing one who had just said she hated It. But that was because she had not yet seen It! She was frightened because she did not understand! He would yet be able to make her see! He would implore the Presence to come to her; to break down her prejudice; to let her have the vision also!

So he sat and comforted her, yet longed to get away and think it out. This sense of depression and bitter disappointment hung about him like a burden; now, of all times, when he should be happy if ever he was to be!

But Gila was nestling close, patting his sleeve, talking little, sweet nonsensical words as if she had really been the little child she seemed. He looked down at her and smiled. How small she was, and child-like! He must remember that she was very young, and probably had never had much bringing-up. Serious things frightened her! He must go gently and lead her! It made him feel old and responsible to look at her—tender, beautiful girl!—enveloped as she was in the garment of his ideal of womanhood.

Yet there was something about it all that drove him from her. He must think it out and come to some clear understanding with himself. He had vowed to himself to bring her to the Christ and he had not accomplished it. Instead she had declared she hated him and the Presence both; yet there he sat making love to her and ignoring it all! He felt a distinct weakness in himself, but did not know how to remedy it.

WHEN he finally got away from Gila and walked feverishly toward the university, he felt as if his soul was crying out within him for a solution of the perplexities in which he was involved. By his side walked a Friend, but there seemed to be a veil between them. Ever mingling with his thoughts came the sweet, tear-wet face of Gila, with its Solveig-look, pleading up at him from the mist of the evening, luring him as it were to forget the Christ.

He was surprised to find that it was still early when he got back to his room, barely half past nine. Yet it had seemed as if it must be near midnight, so much had happened.

What he would have thought if he could have known that at that very minute Tennelly was seated in the chair in the library that he had so lately vacated, and Gila, posing bewitchingly in the firelight, merrily talking him over, is hard to say.

Not that they were saying anything against him—of course not! Tennelly would never have stood for that, and Gila knew better. But Gila had no intention of giving Tennelly any idea how far matters had gone between herself and Courtland. As for Tennelly, he would have been amazed most of the three if he could have known all. He had been Courtland's intimate friend for so many years—years count like ages when one is in college—that he thought he knew him perfectly. He admitted that Gila had an influence over his friend, but that it had really gone heart-deep seemed impossible. Courtland was a man of too much force, even young as he was, and too much maturity of thought, to be permanently entangled with a girl like Gila. That was what Tennelly thought before Gila had turned her eyes toward him and flung a few of her silver gossamer threads about his soul. For always in those first days of his visits to Gila it had been in Courtland's behalf; first, to see if she was good enough for a friend of his friend, and next to get her partnership in the scheme of turning Courtland's thoughts away from "morbid" things.

But that night for the first time Tennelly saw the Solveig in Gila, and was stirred on his own account. The childish blue frock and the simple frilled kerchief did their work with his high soul as well; and he sat, charmed, and watched her. After all, there was more to her than he had thought, or else she was a consummate actress! So Tennelly sat late before the fire, till Gila knew that he would turn aside again often to see her for himself, and then she let him go.

Aggressive Evangelism

"AGGRESSIVE evangelism every day in the year" is the watchword of the National Bible Institute. Its headquarters building at 214-216 West Thirty-fifth Street, New York, is a hive of Christian activity. The results of the outdoor evangelistic campaign of the Institute for 1917, which is still going on, have thus far been most heartening. While the Institute will not reach its goal of 4,000 outdoor meetings, it will not fall far short of that number. Up to October 15 the total number of distinct meetings was 2,704, with an attendance of 484,062. Of these 7,362 men and women professed conversion, or more than twice as many as professed conversion during the entire evangelistic campaign of 1916. This shows conclusively that "the fields are white to harvest"; that human hearts in these awful times are turning to the "Fountain of Life" as never before. The workers of the Institute earnestly desire the prayers of all true believers on behalf of this far-reaching and steadily growing work of the Lord.

DR. FRANCIS E. CLARK, President and Founder of the Christian Endeavor Society, writes to this paper: "Our plans for enrolling a great Christian Endeavor army of food producers and food savers are succeeding wonderfully. Hundreds have already enlisted, new names come in every day, and thousands of acres will be cultivated with the new spirit of doing it for the Master's sake and for our country and the world."

Building the Pullman Car

THE strength of the Pullman car represents one of the best forms of insurance the traveler can buy.

For seven years every car built by the Pullman Company for its service has been of solid steel. These cars possess the rigidity and strength of a battleship.

During this period a large proportion of the older, but still modern cars, have also been rebuilt to almost equal strength.

This has been accomplished by introducing steel underframes, steel vestibules and steel sheathing on the sides.

In addition to the factor of safety, fifty years of experience in designing and building cars has brought about an almost unheard of development in traveling convenience and luxury.

The modern Pullman is fully equipped with the most up-to-date steam fitting, electric wiring and plumbing.

It offers a degree of safety, innumerable luxuries and a personal service that have established a world-wide reputation.

Never Leave "Till Tomorrow—"

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THERE is a time for everything, even to the handing in of articles. As I am writing this today, I realize it should have been finished and given to the printer, neatly typed, two days ago.

Two days ago I might easily have finished it. But two days ago many little tasks asserted themselves, and I said to myself, "Oh, well, there's no great hurry—I can write it the first thing tomorrow."

But "the first thing tomorrow" it rained. And it was late when I reached the office, and my mail was all unopened. And so I decided to write the article in the late afternoon. And then, in the late afternoon, there was a manuscript to be read hurriedly, and before I knew it the dark had come, and it was time to be starting home. That is why, today, I am writing worriedly, at the last minute, with an eye on the clock, wondering whether, after I finish, I can still catch an important train.

THERE was once an old farmer who lived in a busy and prosperous county. His life had always been peaceful and happy, so peaceful that he had never required the services of a judge or a lawyer. And though he was contented with his lot, it rather annoyed him to have neighbors say, "Well, I had to call in Lawyer Smith for advice today," or "The lawyer told me to do so and so." It annoyed him, for he had nothing to talk about at such a time. He had never needed a lawyer.

Almost everybody in that busy and prosperous county had at one time or another had a quarrel, or a lawsuit, or a deed to be signed; and the old farmer, contented though he was, felt the pangs of obscurity and neglect. At last he spoke to his wife.

"My dear," he said, "I think I need the advice of a lawyer."

"A lawyer!" said his wife. "What, in the name of common sense, do you want of a lawyer?"

The old farmer hung his head, because he was childishly ashamed to admit that he had no reason for wanting a lawyer. But at last he spoke.

"Every one else has had a lawyer!" he told her.

His wife laughed.

And yet, the next market day, early in the morning the old farmer started off in his spring buckboard to the county seat; and when he arrived there he drove straight to the office of the best barrister in town. Feeling a bit foolish, he tied his horse and walked in.

"What can I do for you?" said the lawyer, rubbing his hands, as the farmer paused on the threshold.

The old farmer hesitated.

"I want some advice!" he said.

"What sort of advice?" questioned the lawyer.

Again the old farmer hesitated. And then, again, he spoke.

"You see," he said, "everyone I know has had advice from a lawyer and I never had. So I want some."

"Don't you need any?" asked the lawyer, stifling a smile.

"No," answered the farmer quite seriously, "I don't!"

"Then"—the lawyer was openly smiling now—"what advice can I give you?"

"Can't you give me something that would be useful—generally useful?" said the farmer wistfully.

The lawyer thought for a moment; and then, because he was a clever lawyer, he sat down at his desk and wrote out a line or two on a bit of white paper.

"Here," he said, folding the paper into a small square and handing it to the farmer, "here is your advice. Read it when you get home, and perhaps it will be of use to you. Five dollars, please!"

And the farmer, satisfied, paid his five dollars and put the square of paper into his vest pocket, and climbed into his spring buckboard, and drove thoughtfully down the road.

When he arrived home his wife was waiting on the porch. She ran to the carriage block to meet him.

"Did you get your advice?" she asked jokingly.

"I did!" answered the farmer.

"What," laughed his wife, "what was the advice?"

The farmer took the paper from his vest pocket and unfolded it carefully. His wife looked on with curiosity in her eyes.

"'Never,'" read the farmer, "'leave till tomorrow what you can do today!'"

"So that's all the advice you got!" sniffed his wife. "How much did it cost you?"

But the farmer was looking thoughtful.

"I believe," he said at last, "I'll hitch up and bring in the hay this afternoon. I've still time to do it."

"I thought," ventured his wife, "that you'd planned to bring it in tomorrow?"

"I'm going to follow the lawyer's advice," answered the farmer.

All afternoon he drove through the hot sun, loading the hay onto the great wagon and unloading it in the barn. Oftentimes he thought of resting and leaving the remaining stacks until the next day, but the lawyer's advice spurred him on.

And the next day, when he awoke to a furious downpour of rain, he was glad that he had heeded the advice. For if he had waited, his hay would have been spoiled.

THIS is a silly story. But it points a good moral.

"Never leave until tomorrow what you can do today." Never put off a task that can be done because it seems unimportant. For a great many things may happen in a few hours. Death itself has come silently in the night and robbed the one who was going to make a will tomorrow of the power to dispose of his own wealth. Fire has burned up property, and there has been a total loss for the owner who had meant to take out a fire insurance tomorrow. An army and a campaign was lost because an officer thought a tiny order not important enough to obey at once. Yes, it's a good moral.

Even I, who am calling your attention to it, must wait two hours in a not very interesting station, because I have missed the train I would have caught if I had taken my own advice and written this yesterday!

For Thrift and Service

DRINK buttermilk freely, says the Food Administration. The use of buttermilk is largely a matter of habit. Southern cities consume almost as much buttermilk as sweet milk. The difficulty of keeping milk sweet has been largely responsible for the popularity of buttermilk as a beverage.

IN view of the shortage of farm labor next spring, now is a timely occasion to rig up several three- and four-horse eveners to be used on the farm implements. One man with a four-horse team will do almost as much work as two men each using a two-horse team.

WARM drinking-water for the dairy stock will save feed and benefit the milk flow. It saves feed, because it does not draw on the vitality of the cow as cold water does. It benefits the milk flow, because a cow will not reach her maximum production unless she drinks water abundantly. This she will not do if it is ice cold.

THE utilization of skim milk by making it into cottage-cheese and using the cheese as a substitute for meat has been urged jointly by the Food Administration and the Department of Agriculture. Ordinary pasteboard oyster pails make serviceable containers for marketing cottage-cheese locally in small retail quantities.

SQUIRRELS aren't the only animals that are laying by a store of nuts this fall. Many patriotic farm boys are going to eat them this winter instead of candy.

Self-Control

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. I Cor. 9 : 24-27 (Consecration Meeting).

CONTROL is the central factor of progress. It is the foundation of success, the mark of power. The electric current, under control, moves our cars, drives our machines, lights our homes and carries our messages. The power of steam, under control, sends our express trains at lightning speed over plain and mountain, drives the generators which harness electricity to our tasks, hammers out our forgings, heats our buildings, and even bakes our bread. The power of gravity in the rushing water in the penstock likewise serves mankind. But all these powers are inferior to the power within a man which controls his passions, his speech, his thoughts and his actions. The man who can control himself has the world at his feet. There are two twin sources of this power an invincible will and a true and unsullied heart. "His strength was as the strength of ten because his heart was pure," says the poet of Sir Launfal. If our heart is not right, if there are little sins, hidden faults, jealousies, covetings, insincerity, any of these in our life, the chain of our self-control will snap at the critical time and we will be lost in a fit of temper, or the opportunity will pass before our hand can strike. If our heart is right and we have access by faith to the Saviour's love, his strength will supplement our own and will support the invincible will which is the other twin in the team of self-control. But we must will to conquer, to lead, to follow faithfully before we can practice self-control. We can not delegate our conduct to our intentions, our inclinations, or our emotions; the will must be master. Then if to this indomitable will we add a prayer, the victory will be ours, and those who know not the secret will wonder at our self-control.

The Partnership of the Heart and Lips

Epworth League Topic. Rom. 9 : 8-10 and Luke 6 : 45.

THE lips are the spokesman of the heart. With the heart we believe, with our lips we confess our faith, and the Word says that "out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh." But if the heart is empty, what of the lips? They become as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. It is not always those who speak most fluently whose heart experience is deepest. Sometimes fluent speech covers up an empty and sometimes an unworthy heart, but there is always that in its fluency which brands it false, while the very fact that the testimony is halting and the speech stammering may mark the genuineness of the heart out of whose fulness the testimony flows. It is not enough merely to believe. The Scripture commands confession. Many a soul timid, afraid, has lost through long years the full blessing of the believer by failing to add testimony to faith. Then, perhaps, in a brief instant, with unwonted strength the lips have been made to breathe the one short sentence, "I love Jesus," and the heart has been charged with a warmth of blessing from on high, so that never again is it so difficult for the lips to speak what the heart has felt. Methodism has always been a witnessing faith. The class-meeting was a place of testimony. The Epworth League is the Young People's class, and you who failed in testimony lost the rich blessings which are promised by the Saviour to those who confess his name before men. He has filled your heart in order that you may tell a hungry world of his love.

THE UPPER ATMOSPHERE. An agitated neighbor had just informed Mrs. Warren that her son was at the top of a telegraph pole in the vicinity. When the boy had been coaxed back to earth again, his mother remonstrated. "Tad, I've told you how dangerous that is: now why will you persist in climbing those poles?"

"But, ma," exclaimed the boy in an aggrieved tone, "I have to have some fresh air!"

THE Sedan idea, as expressed in this new Oakland Sensible Six, is far more than simply a body design for year 'round use.

It is a distinct type of motor car more comfortable for general touring than any other, made thoroughly practical by the character of the chassis beneath it.

It affords the user the advantages both of the open and of the closed car, without sacrifice of the desirable qualities of either.

It combines in exceedingly effective proportion high power and perfect shelter, great range and usefulness with strict economy.

The body of the new Oakland Sensible Six Sedan is unusually roomy, very stoutly built, and easily convertible for summer or winter driving.

The high-speed overhead-valve motor around which the car is built easily cancels the slightly additional weight, retaining that economy of fuel for which it is everywhere noted.

This motor delivers at 2600 r.p.m. 44 full horsepower, and preserves in the Sedan the snap and spirit of an open car, with a touring range fully as great.

The convenience of this model's design and the comfort of its appointment are not to be equalled in another type of body.

Nehemiah Rebuilds the Walls

International Sunday School Lesson for December 2. Neh. 4

A Splendid Example of Team Work

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph. D.

IN response to the fine leadership of Nehemiah, the people of Jerusalem and the surrounding towns started to reconstruct the fortifications of the city. The story of their struggles and success constitutes one of the best examples of cooperation on record. And cooperation is in a true sense the world's need. We have had enough of selfish competition and foolish discord.

On its social side, the Gospel of Jesus is an appeal for human fellowship in service. The Golden Rule is really based upon this truth. Paul developed the idea of Christian interdependence, teaching that our very membership in the kingdom of Christ makes us "members one of another." And unless we as Christians can do team work, we stultify our professions of unity in one spirit. It has been well said that "The world is not to be convinced and converted by reasoning or philosophy or eloquence, but by the love of Christians for one another." This love, if it means anything, means mutual ministries.

The Family as a Unit

In this familiar tale of Nehemiah's achievement, we find that this wise administrator used the family as the working unit. Some one says that this is only following out the customary Jewish procedure. It was a wise and right procedure that we ought to imitate today. There is not the same family loyalty there formerly was. Even in the religious life, we find father going this way and mother that, and children not going any way at all. This hurrying age sends one to work at one hour and another to school at another, until perhaps the Sunday table is the only real meeting-place of the whole group. How much is lost when the Lord's Day does not take the family to one familiar house of prayer and gather them around one family altar of praise? If a modern American family is diligently building the kingdom of God together, there is a happy home and a useful working force.

Now, we are Sunday school workers and builders of the unseen city. Let us too "set the people after their families." Bring in the older brother and sister. Get the father's interest through a live Bible class for men.

The emergencies of the present year should deepen family loyalty. All must work for an absent soldier boy. Together they must "Save the meat, conserve the wheat, and waste nothing." Together they must buy Liberty Bonds.

Is it needful to say that the family life should be rich in comfort, in guidance, in encouragement to stick to the task whether it be spiritual or commonplace?

Community Cooperation

All in all, we have achieved a large measure of real Christian idealism in the home, but have we done quite as well in the community? Our wise old Master Builder organized the entire community for cooperative service. When it came to the civic task, the goldsmith, the merchant, the priest, the peasant, the perfumer, labored side by side. Moreover, each group of occupations constituted a working force with mutual interests to spur them on. There was a friendly emulation among them as to which could do most for the good of all.

One of the most encouraging manifestations in American life is the growth of real community cooperation. Consider how splendidly the Associated Advertising Clubs, with their motto "Truth," have helped to make business publicity work more Christian. Even commercial enterprises depend for their success on honor, patience and team work.

The names in the third chapter of Nehemiah may be hard to pronounce, but they stand for this truth: that the best product of any nation or city is not its crops, its manufacturers, or even its works of art, but its consecrated men. "The truest test of civilization is the kind of men the country turns out." These ancient citizens were men who devoted themselves to the commonwealth; nobles or laborers, they made self-interest subordinate, and were willing to do hard and dirty work. Yet all these men had been there for years, only Nehemiah had brought the enthusiasm and the leadership that aroused their dormant possibilities. Is the church in your town fulfilling this mission—stirring up the citizens to unselfish human service?

The Foes of Civic Upbuilding

Like every great reformer, Nehemiah found plenty of enemies. He found pessimists within the group ready to say, "There is much rubbish; we are not able to build the wall." He found those cynical bystanders who never get in and play the game, but always hang around the side lines and find fault. Countless Sanballats and Tobiahs stand around, criticizing the Christian Church for its shortcomings and mistakes. Some are only a little warped in their sympathies, but others have some personal reason for their aloofness. Perhaps it is a feeling that if the Christian Church succeeds, they will lose some cherished private means of gain.

Nehemiah conquered all natural human misunderstandings, jealousies and suspicions within quite readily. But he had to take up weapons against the predatory enemies without. The Arabians, Ammonites and Ashdodites saw their chance of robbery and blackmail disappearing. They were like the grafters, political heelers and liquor dealers who think the church should "stick to the Gospel" and take no interest in the welfare of the community. It is a high compliment when such enemies threaten, for it proves that our work really counts.

A Time for Fight

In the third chapter of Ecclesiastes is an illuminating essay on timeliness. There is a time for very diverse attitudes of mind. Our beloved America has come to a time when we must fight. We wanted peace that we might play the Good Samaritan. We wanted peace because we hate war and its destructiveness and brutality. But now we must fight, lest all we have built should be swept away. Our liberty, our free institutions, all the sane and fraternal forces in international life are at stake. Nehemiah would be no "peace at any price" man if he were here now, any more than he was long ago.

God grant that Christian America may be wise and strong enough to keep on building while she fights! Nehemiah did not give up his constructive work. His helpers carried the trowel as well as the sword. So must we, with all our mighty preparations for war, find a way to keep building up the ideals of Christ and the ministries of peace. We must not neglect the teaching of our children, but find new teachers to take the places of those who go away to battle. We must not, at all events, let our missionary propaganda throughout the world fall into neglect because of this hideous war. Foreign missions are exactly the opposite of war—the sending of money, supplies and men to help other nations and alien peoples. They are constructive where war is destructive. With God's help, our evangelism, our schools, our charitable institutions, our program of community betterment shall continue side by side with this awful output of explosives and weapons of slaughter.

Eternal Vigilance

What an ordeal it was for Nehemiah! From the diary we read, "So neither I, nor my brethren, nor my servants, nor the men of the guard that followed me, none of us put off our clothes." On watch day and night, by day builders ready to be soldiers if need arose, by night a reserve in case of a sudden onslaught. So must be our modern Christian—anxious to build, but willing to fight and die if he must, like others who made that sacrifice for us.

In the modern city, those who are building cooperation and service must also be ready to suppress the spoilsmen, the self-seekers, the forces that prey on men and women. Every now and then we have to rally en masse against the political tricksters who deceive the people and try to supplant the shepherds with hirelings, or thieves and robbers. In the church we must watch and pray lest we fall into temptation. For the church itself has often been led astray from its true loyalty to God and his children. Long ago Luther took arms against the spiritual Sanballats and Tobiahs who wished to keep their yoke on the Christian world. But Protestantism still needs Luthers to keep vigil over the mighty organization that means progress and liberty, or reaction and bondage for the minds of men.

So let us build the church's bulwarks; let us organize her vital forces; let us watch and pray, lest the enemy secretly take possession of humanity's citadel, her spiritual Jerusalem, the Zion of God.

In the succeeding chapter we have the evidence of Nehemiah's unselfishness, and his fearless rebuke of greed. He did not want any war profits. This man was able to write his record clear, "So did not I." No wonder that the people had a mind to work. Cooperation is only possible with consecrated leaders.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

How to Secure Prompt Attendance

SOME of the most successful superintendents in the country, in schools small and large, have here contributed for Christian Herald readers their experience in securing a good attendance at the start of the Sunday school session.

Let us sit in this Sunday schools forum and listen while these men tell how they did it.

"I get about 90 per cent. results. We make it so interesting and attractive that scholars want to be on time. I tell them what is to be the program Sunday morning."

"We have a pennant which is awarded to the class having the best opening attendance for the previous month."

"We have a good orchestra play half an hour before opening time. We mark 'on time' attendance."

"By a display card, 'I am early'; reverse, 'I am late.'"

"We use 'on time' buttons with the Junior Department. Attractive live addresses for opening exercises of Intermediate Boys' and Girls' Department."

"Last week I distributed seventy-five Chinese coins to the first seventy-five reporting."

"By credit system for 'on time,' with four other points."

"By making a penalty on tardiness on class reports for each Sabbath."

"By closing the doors promptly at the opening of school and keeping them closed during the opening services, which are brief—not over fifteen minutes. The latecomers wait in the vestibule."

"By beginning sharp on time and having something special in first part of program."

"By prompt attendance of teachers.

"I secure the cooperation of scholars in this, and we are fairly successful."

"School meets at 12 o'clock. We insist that there shall be at least a ten-minute interval between church service and school service."

"In the Intermediate Department we have helped by using the credit system."

"I lay special stress upon promptness. We used a cup contest, which worked well."

"By grading thirty per cent. 'present,' fifty per cent. 'on time,' ten per cent. 'Bible,' ten per cent. 'offering.' An average of ninety per cent. entitles the scholar to special honors."

"In a little contest plan which we tried we made prompt attendance count for three points and attendance one point."

"We use the post office system as originated by a Sunday school man in Memphis, Tenn. (John R. Pepper). Also, organized classes have a merit system which includes promptness."

"At the close of the school I ask all who were on time to rise, and I compliment them for it.'

"By having some special feature early in the opening exercises, such as stereopticon."

"By getting teachers to come ten minutes before opening of school.'

"Ours is a rural school, meets in schoolhouse and members come long distances. I have used personal invitations, invitation committees, special days, telephone and written messages, but chief effort is to have the Sunday school attractive and give real food."

"By beginning on time, whether music leader is there or not"

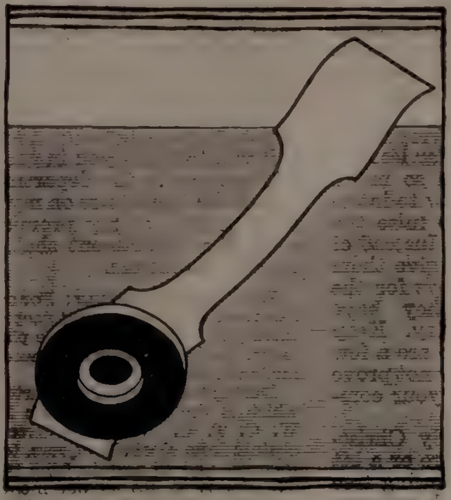
"A Boy Scout sees that the loiterers get in."

HOW TO END CORNS



SAFE

TEMPORARY

Which Way for You?

Above are pictured three ways to treat corns.

Blue-jay is the most certain. It is safe and gentle.

Yet the unknowing ones experiment with harsh, mussy liquids or the dangerous razor.

These two ways are temporary.

But Blue-jay is scientific. The spot of medicated wax, discovered by a great chemist, soothes while it works.

Place a Blue-jay Plaster on your throbbing corn tonight.

Relief is instant. The soft felt pad stops the pain by relieving the pressure.

In 48 hours the medicated wax has saturated the corn—undermined it to its roots—and it comes off painlessly, completely.

Nature responds quickly to such a gentle, corrective treatment.

Hardly a corn can resist. Of course once in a while there is an old, stubborn corn which requires a second or third application. But such are rare.

Blue-jay Plasters are made by Bauer & Black, the great surgical dressing house.

Try a Blue-jay Plaster now. Join the pain-free thousands who rely on Blue-jay.

Once you know Blue-jay, you'll never consent to have a corn again, nor to coddle it with temporary ways.

The cost is slight, the application simple.

Remember, we promise immediate relief and a defenseless corn.

Blue-jay Plasters are sold by all druggists—25c per package.

Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Plan for the Exchange of Experiences between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

THANKSGIVING time and Christmas are so closely associated in our hearts and in all our home traditions that to most of us it seems but a brief step from the one holiday to the other. Even though we may have been too busy all the year to give a serious thought to Christmas, the homey cheer of Thanksgiving Day never fails to jostle us out of this self-absorption and set us to planning a Christmas season which shall be satisfying and worth while.

There is a lot of talk nowadays about the foolishness of celebrating Christmas. There are those who would have us abolish trees and gifts; who remind us that Christmas debts (sometimes) hang over our foolish heads from one December to the next; who declare that the Christmas season, instead of being holy and purifying, has become typical of gluttony and avarice and resentment and family quarrels and indigestion and hard times. In short, in the opinion of these "No-Christmas!" persons, our duty to society on Christmas Day is to fly to the nearest cave and hide until the dangerous hour is past.

ALL this pessimism would be merely funny, were there not a grain of truth in it. Our concept of Christmas has become material and unworthy. It lies with us, then, to alter our viewpoint, so that Christmas once more stands for what it really is: the commemoration of the birth of Jesus Christ. And would it not seem better, instead of giving less every year, to give more: but nobler gifts, differently given?

For instance, in place of lavishing expensive presents on our family, friends, and relatives, let us this year lavish thought and time and labor (and pennies) on a community Christmas celebration which shall include every one—a party which shall leave us all (big children and little) a bit better, and a whole lot happier, than we were on December 23.

It has been my privilege to live through one such Christmas; and this is why I speak. It was a Christmas that was giftless. I was a stranger in a great city. And my only "party" was the privilege of standing in a big city park and looking up at a shining "community" tree and of listening to "Holy Night"—that sweetest of carols—as it floated out over the park from the throats of the hundreds of men, women and children crowded about the tree.

I can hardly speak of that experience. But if you have never known it—if your community has always celebrated Christmas as individuals instead of as one great Christian body—do plan for a community Christmas this year!

THE celebration need cost very little. Indeed, you will find it far less expensive to each person than so many home celebrations. Begin now to interest your community, and to raise the small amount you will need. Instead of planning it for the children, give them the task of furnishing the toys for the great tree, from money they have earned. Do not attempt display. Keep the celebration simple. Here are a few suggestions which may or may not prove worth while. Why couldn't your community

1. Have carol singing, early Christmas morning, in a town square or a bit of woods, at the foot of a growing tree which had been trimmed with popcorn and bright ornaments, and hung with toys for all the children in town. After the carols, these toys could be distributed.
2. Give a series of tableaux (or scenes) from Biblical history, in some central building: the program being continuous all day and evening, many substitutes being trained for every part. The door should be wide open all day, no admission being charged; and after each round of tableaux the hall should be emptied, so that it could fill up again.
3. Have a soldiers' and sailors' Christmas party in the assembly room of the high school: a party given wholly by the teachers and pupils. All the gifts could be soldiers' comforts, made and donated by the children. These could be taken from the tree and presented to the families of the absent "boy," to be shipped to the front. Every man the town has sent must be remembered.
4. Have a big community Christmas tree in the town hall; hall and tree being donated by public-spirited townsmen; the toys by the children; the refreshments by housewives; and the program by talented young folks.

THESE are mere suggestions. Your community may celebrate in a far more original and beautiful way. If it does (or did last year), do tell us about it, so that some of us may try out the same plan. As late as January 15, 1918, I shall be glad to receive your accounts.

This discussion of Christmas plans—which had to be included in this issue if it was to reach you in good time—has left us room in the department for only one of the fine letters on my desk. Here it is, as well as my promise that next week the department shall be devoted entirely to letters.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: For as far back as I can remember, the young people of our community have had no suitable places of amusement, but have just drifted according to their inclinations.

During the past year we started a Y. P. B.—which is the Young People's Branch of the W. C. T. U. We have three pledges: to abstain from alcoholic liquors, to abstain from tobacco, and to abstain from profanity; and our aim is to get all our members into the church and Sabbath school. We already have a membership of about thirty, and each one seems interested in the work.

We meet once a month at the home of one of the members; have a short but good literary program, with plenty of music; then, after the business meeting, we serve refreshments and play games. We have had a picnic, wiener roast, and other social gatherings to keep up the interest. We send flowers to the sick, offer our services whenever needed, and have been making comfort bags for and furnishing testaments to our soldier boys.

We have found that our young people are trying to live up to our aims, and are no longer frequenting questionable places of amusement.

Hoping this may be of some use to you in your splendid work,

I am very sincerely yours,
—— — ——.

I chose this letter because it is a clear, practical statement of how one community in Pennsylvania overcame an evil common to nearly all rural neighborhoods. I think it is a solution which none of us can afford to miss.

VERA L. CONNOLLY.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE caravan routes in the desert are always laid out if possible so that they reach at midday some cool oasis where the traveler and his patient beast of burden can refresh themselves for the travel of the rest of the day. Thus the word oasis has come to mean a place of refreshment, and such indeed is prayer at noontime. Even though we have not forgotten to come before His presence with praise and thanksgiving in the morning, even though we have begun the day in the blessing of his love, the pressure of events and the multiple and crowding duties of the day, the disappointments, the distractions, the annoyances, bring us up to noontime spiritually fagged and overborne. If there were no oasis of refreshment our spirits might break before the end of the day and our high purpose might be lost in surrender to the commonplace. But just here steps in the noontime prayer to bring us back again and give us new hope, higher courage and refreshing strength. We do despite to our best interests when we drive past this waiting oasis with a hurried lunch and a quick return to the cares of the day, with no thought of Him whose service only makes the day worth while.

One year ago M. H., of Pennsylvania, asked the League to pray for her sister-in-law, for whose restored health she praises God. She now asks us to pray that her mother may be healed of a painful infirmity, that her child's eyesight may improve, and that a dear friend, who was estranged by gossip, may return. She encloses an offering for the Lord's work in alleviating the suffering of his little ones.

E. W. S. writes that a pastor desired to serve with the Y. M. C. A. in France, and his congregation prayed earnestly for an acceptable substitute. The prayer was answered, and the pastor sailed on his errand of mercy.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Elkhart, Ind.; Wendell, Idaho; Edmeston, N. Y. (for a revival in two churches); Bourbon, Ill. (for a series of meetings to be held).

L. B. asks prayer that a pastor may be sent to the Baptist Church at Mayview, Mo.

Mrs. C. asks prayer that husband's mind may be restored; Mrs. I. F. F., that mother-in-law's mind may be restored.

Mrs. C. asks prayer that husband's sight may be restored; Mrs. S. S., that daughter's sight may be restored; two friends, that sight may be restored.

Four friends ask prayer for the restoration of hearing.

Four friends ask prayer for special blessings for others.

Fifteen friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Six friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Seven parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; three wives, their husbands; fifteen, other relatives and friends.

Thirty friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. J. W. W., that daughter may pass safely through an operation; twenty-eight, for healing for self, including A. F. M., that health and strength may be restored without an operation; Mrs. H. C. B. and Mrs. S. M. J., to regain the use of limbs.

Fifteen friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Mrs. E. L., Sandwick, Ill.; Mrs. P. W., Modest Town, Va.; Miss L. B. C., Bourbon, Ill.; Mrs. A. M. V., Akron, Ohio; Mrs. T. A. A., Garber, Okla.; Miss J. F. W., Harlan, Iowa; Mrs. O. F. T., Silex, Mo.; E. M., Flat Top, Colo.; Mrs. A. J. H., Birmingham, Ala.; N. E. H., Louisville, Ky.; Mrs. J. S. M., Gilmanton, N. H.; I. B. B., Clarkesburg, W. Va.; Mrs. J. W. W., Belleville, Pa.; O. M., Forsyth, Mont.; A. R. C., Saratoga Springs, N. Y.; Miss K. E. T., Memphis, Tenn.; Mrs. F. B. C., San Francisco, Calif.

The War vs. Creeds

THAT the needs of the hour are unifying the various sects is becoming apparent. In Utah recently a representative of the Y. M. C. A. appeared before the local Council of National Defense with a request for aid in the raising of $10,000 for the moral protection of Utah soldiers.

This particular Council is made up of members of various churches—among them the Jewish, the Catholic, and the Mormon Churches. One member of the Council, a leading Catholic, put the question:

"Does the Y. M. C. A. admit to membership Mormons, Jews, or Catholics?"

"No," was the reply.

It looked dark for the request. But the Catholic Bishop of Utah rose and emphatically called attention to the fact that, since President Wilson had asked the Y. M. C. A. to do that work, it was the business of the various denominations to unite upon it. The Council broke into spontaneous applause.

Put your Motoring on a War Basis with the Franklin Car

SOME people think they can solve the thrift question by talking about it. The war situation is actual and real. Every man feels it is his duty to help the country, but he tells you what the Government ought to do instead of taking the first practical step—meeting the plain facts in the things close at hand; things he buys and uses and pays to maintain.

Gasoline and rubber are prime necessities of War. Yet many a car owner who talks thrift is actually destroying fifty per cent more of these commodities than his motoring should require.

War Time Activity Demands Economy in Motor Car Operation

Ask the man who gets eight, ten or twelve miles to the gallon of gasoline and five or six thousand miles to the set of tires. He probably has the feeling—almost he conviction—that he can do etter with the Franklin, but it is asier to close his eyes to the facts nd wonder whether the Frankin's record for gasoline and tire aving is really and actually true.

He does not investigate—he akes refuge in general doubt.

Another way he has of side tepping the issue is to argue that n these days it is better economy o hang on to his old car. He nows how wasteful it is to run, et he overlooks the fact that the ranklin saving in gasoline, tires nd oil would more than carry is investment in a Franklin Car.

Perhaps he says he will meet conditions by using his car less. He forgets that while the average car is standing idle its depreciation offsets any reduction in running expense he could make.

He ought to see that it is true conservation for him to put his motoring on a War basis now; clean up his old car proposition; take a fresh start and get an automobile that actually fits conditions as they are today.

War time thrift and economy are possible to every motorist without reducing his mileage or curtailing the use of his car. War time activity makes this fact of vital interest. Thousands of men are finding increased demands upon their time and more work for their automobile.

Franklin Holds World's Records for Thrift and Efficiency

The Thrift and Efficiency Standards of the Franklin Car are matters of public record.

On May 1st, 1914, 94 Franklin cars in all parts of the country averaged 32.8 miles to the gallon of gasoline.

On May 1st, 1915, 137 Franklin cars averaged 32.1 miles to the gallon.

While July 13th, 1917, 179 Franklin cars established the remarkable average of 40.3 miles to the single gallon of gasoline.

All records under Standard Efficiency Test Rules.

In the Yale University Fuel Economy Test, Professor Lockwood and Arthur B. Browne, M.E. established the fact that the Franklin Car uses less gasoline per mile than any other car with six or more cylinders.

On November 17th, 1915, a Franklin Car covered 1046 miles on a single gallon of oil—a run from New York to Chicago.

Right Now Is the Time for All Motorists to Investigate the Franklin

Franklin Economy and Efficiency as demonstrated by these records of low gasoline consumption continue, throughout the car. Franklin owners' individual tire mileage reports, for instance, over a period of five years, give a national average of 10,203 miles to the set.

The value of the Franklin Car as an investment is clearly shown every time you find a used Franklin for sale. It brings a 20% higher price than any other fine car in proportion to its first cost and the use it had. The time is close at hand when the motorist must choose between a restricted use of his car or meeting conditions in a constructive way with the economical Franklin.

A Pictorial Method of Bible Study

Based Upon the Researches of the World's Most Eminent Bible Scholars

WILL BEGIN NEXT WEEK

$5,000.00 IN REWARDS

Christian Herald extends an invitation to all, young and old alike, to pleasantly spend some hours of the long winter evenings now so near in the best employment we can suggest—that of Bible study.

We offer this invitation with all confidence, not merely because of the ever-desirable gain in Bible knowledge which every participant will acquire, but also because our third is founded upon striking portions of the Bible selected by a group of the most learned Bible authorities in the whole wide world—the eminent men who comprise the Lesson Committee of the International Sunday School Association.

International Sunday School Lessons and Daily Home Readings

Our reference book in the National Bible Picture Study, the text book of about 2,000 Bible verses which participants will use, is a verbatim copy of the Bible verses comprising the International Sunday School Lessons and the Daily Home Readings for the next five months. We have had these Lessons and Readings printed in a separate book, which we call "International Bible Readings," and offer to all as part of the National Bible Picture Study Outfit.

In compiling our reference book for the third Study it was suggested that we do not simply select a number of Bible verses at random, but, instead, print the Lessons and Home Readings complete for a given period, so that participants will experience the double gain of studying Bible verses that tell connected stories—learning the Sunday School Lessons and Daily Home Readings by the interesting process of pictorial comparison!

30 Pictures—To Start Next Week

How will you compete in the National Bible Picture Study?

By reading over the list of Bible verses furnished you, and selecting those that most appropriately fit 30 Bible pictures.

These pictures will begin appearing in Christian Herald next week, and will continue to appear until all 30 have been published—probably for about 15 weeks.

You will save these pictures as they appear, compare them with the Bible verses comprising your reference book, and select the verses that seem to fit the pictures best.

Then you will write down your chosen verses in the Answer Book we offer you, and send it in to us. No verses may be submitted for the pictures except those printed in our handy little reference book, International Bible Readings.

Those who select the verses that fit the 30 pictures best, according to the decisions of a Committee of Judges, will be awarded $5,000.00 in cash prizes, aggregating one thousand and one cash sums in all, and starting with a first prize of $1,000.00. Competition without expense is guaranteed by the rules which are free upon request. The rules will appear soon in the Christian Herald, also.

Speak for Your Outfit Now

The complete Outfit for convenient participation in our Study is composed of the reference list of about 2,000 Bible verses, called International Bible Readings, and the Answer Book, in which you submit your chosen verses.

You can reserve your Outfit right now—and we will mail it to you, postpaid, just as soon as it is off the press.

SPECIAL OFFER Send in your subscription to Christian Herald for one year, at the regular price of $2.00, enclosing also 10 cents to pay postage and handling charges on the Outfit—a total payment of $2.10. This will entitle you to receive the Outfit complete, with rules and all information. There will be nothing more to secure at any time. $2.10

You will want to start at the start of this greatest of Bible studies. You cannot miss being one of the happy participants. The whole family, from grandmother to the little Sunday School scholars themselves, will find pleasure and profit in competing. Order now!

Outfit Order Form

CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City

Gentlemen: I enclose $2.10, for which enter my subscription to the Christian Herald for one year (if you are now a subscriber this will be added on to the expiration date of your present subscription) and send me, postpaid, the complete National Bible Picture Study Outfit just as soon as it is off the press, with rules and all news about the Study.

How to Avoid Headaches

By DR. W. H. VAIL

HEADACHE is pain in the head, and is the most common ailment that flesh is heir to. The head aches oftener than all other parts of the body taken together; yet all the different varieties of pain which afflict the head are not called headaches.

We are contemplating the commonest of ailments, and one so universally experienced; yet let any one but ask you to explain its nature, or cause, and you are brought face to face with a problem that has been hotly disputed by the ablest medical experts for generations, and one that remains unsolved today.

Strange to say, in nine cases out of ten, the head is not to blame for the existence of the pain. The brain acts the part of sentinel, sounding the alarm, calling our attention to the fact that damage has been inflicted upon some part, or organ, of the body; and we are wise if we institute a search for the cause, elsewhere, as a rule, than in the brain or head.

Among other varieties we have sick headaches, bilious headaches, nervous headaches, congestive headaches, and uremic headaches; each name indicating more or less accurately the origin of the trouble in that variety, and proving that the brain, of which we are so proud (claiming that it is the master of all human energy), is none the less the servant of the body. And here it is that we see the highest and noblest law of life exemplified, in that the brain or head meekly offers itself as the vicarious sacrifice for the sins of the whole body. If the hand or foot is injured, the head suffers; for though we have many members, we are one body. Therefore, in considering how to avoid headaches, we are discussing something as broad as human nature itself; and when anything tends to derange or deteriorate any part or organ of the body, naturally the danger signal is flown to the breeze in the shape of a headache.

NINETY per cent. of all of our diseases are ushered in with pain, and in most instances the pain is either in the head, or is very quickly reflected there. In this connection it is interesting to remember that the brain substance rarely suffers pain. In fact, this is the truth with most deep-seated organs. Surgeons assure us that in operations, cutting through the brain substance causes little or no pain, and we know that hemorrhages in the brain interfere with the functions of that organ, yet cause no pain. Paradoxical as it may seem, in one sense, it is a sign of a certain degree of health to be able to experience a headache, for it indicates that the brain has not lost its power to warn its owner of impending danger.

As the varieties of headaches are legion, it follows as a natural consequence that the causes should be classified as numerous, including anything from the straining of the eyes, through the long list of ills accompanying indigestion and auto-intoxication, down to the wearing of improper shoes and gloves. And when one stops to consider either class of causes, he can see how the theme enlarges.

Take the overstraining of the eyes for instance, and immediately we come upon three subdivisions; the use of too bright or too dim lights; not sitting in proper relation to the light when using the eyes in reading, studying or working; and thirdly, not having proper glasses to remedy the defects of vision. We might enlarge upon each of the many varieties of the causes of headache.

HAVING learned of the great variety of headaches, and that each variety has its separate cause, is it not little short of madness to follow the almost universal custom, when suffering from a headache, of rushing to the drug store and meekly swallowing some nostrum or a quack medicine, or applying some narcotic liniment or ointment to deaden the pain? Yes, we deaden the pain; but it is at the risk of two evils, one of which is the fastening upon the sufferer the habit of recurrent headaches, and the other the danger of resorting to sedatives for the relief of every pain as it occurs.

Here we have the most fertile cause of the opium and kindred habits. Just here let us not forget that there is one remedy which is applicable to all headaches, whatever their cause, and is harmless besides; and that is rest. In fact, the great mission of headaches is to warn the sufferer that it is high time to rest.

FROM the above statement of facts and conclusions respecting the nature and causes of headaches, it will readily be gathered that in order to avoid headaches the course to pursue is to avoid the causes; for, according to the law of cause and effect, you cannot have the effect without the antecedent cause. Excluding trouble with the eyes as one of the causes of nervous headaches, it is truly wonderful how universally the different forms of headaches are traceable to some variety of indigestion or auto-intoxication. In other words, if you wish to avoid headaches, live the simple life, limiting your diet to those articles of food which are readily assimilated; masticate your food thoroughly, avoiding stimulating foods as well as stimulating liquids; sleep only in well-ventilated rooms, and exercise in the open air sufficiently to remove all effete matter from your system.

What One Brave Woman Did

MRS. R. W. C., a reader in Rantowles, S. C., sends this interesting letter telling of her experiences in starting a Sunday school under adverse conditions: "We live twenty miles from Charleston, and twelve miles to the nearest church. As I have seven children, I felt the need of a Sunday school, and started one at the schoolhouse, which is five minutes' walk from our house. There are five families on the plantation, and now they all attend the Sunday school and services every Sunday morning. There are twenty-five altogether with the children and adults.

"I prepare the services. I select the sermon from the Christian Herald, which is read by one of the members, and we sing the old Gospel Hymns 1 to 6. I put my organ in the schoolhouse, so that we have music, and the children love to sing. I draw maps on the blackboard to explain the Sunday school lesson, and I find this a great help, as I explain the lesson to all present. It is one large class. I usually start to study the Sunday school lesson on Monday for the following Sunday. I write down all the important facts, and every day I go over the lesson and read "Helps on the Lesson" from the Quarterlies and the Christian Herald, so that when Sunday comes I am prepared to teach the lesson.

"It is five years since I started this Sunday school, and I never go to the services without first asking God's help, and he has helped me and given me a deeper knowledge of himself and his Word.

"I am a Cuban. When we went to Hoboken, N. J., I was but a child. At the age of sixteen years I joined the First Baptist Church there, and was an active member of the Christian Endeavor Society and had a class of girls in the Sunday school. When I came South to this quiet place, with no church near, I was much discouraged for a while, and I questioned our Heavenly Father why he sent me here; but I have learned in these years that 'in just that very place of his where he hath put, and keepeth you, God hath no other thing to do.'

"I have found in the Christian Herald so much help and comfort in every page; Margaret E. Sangster's writings are beautiful, and the Sermons and Daily Meditations and the Editor's page are splendid. God bless you in your work."

Lutherans Vote for Church Unity

By REV. E. E. RYDEN

ASSEMBLING from all parts of the land, thousands of members of the General Council of the Lutheran Church in North America came together in Philadelphia for the thirty-sixth convention of that body, and when the sessions came to a close on October 31, the most momentous decisions in the history of the Council had been reached. Not only had it given its unanimous endorsement to the movement for Lutheran unity, but measures had been taken to make the Lutheran Church a greater power in America.

Three important anniversaries were celebrated. The quadricentennial of the Reformation formed the central theme of the jubilee. The 175th anniversary of the landing in America of the Lutheran patriarch, Henry Melchior Mühlenberg, was also appropriately observed, and the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the General Council was another event not overlooked.

The most important business before the convention was the proposed organization of the United Lutheran Church in America. The march of events this year toward the consummation of this plan has been so rapid as to amaze the most optimistic Lutherans. At a meeting of the Joint Lutheran Committee on the Celebration of the Quadricentennial of the Reformation, held in Philadelphia, April 18, 1917, it was resolved that the most fitting manner in which to commemorate the Reformation would be to bring about the organic union of the three affiliated Lutheran bodies, the General Synod, the General Council, and the United Synod in the South. A joint committee immediately set about to frame a constitution for the united church. When the General Synod met in Chicago in June, it gave its unanimous approval to the plan. Inasmuch as the United Synod in the South is almost certain to favor the proposed merger, it was generally felt that the success or the failure of the plan would hinge on the action of the General Council.

ON Thursday, October 25, the important question was taken up for consideration. Witherspoon Hall was thronged. Commissions representing all three general bodies filed up to the platform while the audience sang "Lord, Keep Us Steadfast in Thy Word." Stirring addresses were made, enthusiasm ran high, and when the vote was finally taken, not a dissenting voice was heard. Scarcely had President Theodore E. Schmauk announced the result, when again the vast throng broke into singing, this time the grand Lutheran hymn of praise, "Now Thank We All Our God!"

If the United Synod in the South gives its approval to the merger, as is confidently expected, the consummation of the union will take place in November, 1918, when the United Lutheran Church in America will become a reality. The proposed organization will bring into organic union forty-six district synods, with 4,947 congregations, 3,439 ministers, and 1,343,074 baptized members. It is the hope of the leaders in the movement that eventually all the Lutheran bodies in America, with their total baptized membership of 3,774,774 souls, will be brought into the United Lutheran Church.

The three general bodies involved in the proposed merger have been gradually approaching each other for years. One of the first steps was the appointment of a joint committee to bring out a Common Service Book. After twenty years of arduous labor, the committee has completed its work, and the first copy of the new Church Book was exhibited before the convention. It will be the official book of worship of the Lutheran Church in America.

The necessity of Lutheran unity was emphasized in the report of the joint Lutheran War Commission appointed to supervise work among soldiers and sailors. "The United States government," declared the report, "will not recognize ten or twelve separate Lutheran commissions, but it will listen to the demands of the United Lutheran War Commission." The Lutheran Church is preparing to take up work among the soldiers and sailors with great energy. Two and a half million dollars will be raised for this purpose, to be expended during the next two years. The General Council pledged itself to raise $150,000 of this amount for the first year. The Norwegian Lutherans are raising $100,000. Sixty-six civilian chaplains will be sent immediately to the training-stations and cantonments, and the Lutheran Commission has also been asked by the government to furnish chaplains for interned aliens. An Army and Navy Service Book, containing Scripture passages, hymns and prayers adapted for hospital and camp, has been prepared, and will be given to every Lutheran soldier and sailor.

THE loyalty of the church was emphasized again and again during the course of the Convention. Dr. Schmauk's opening address was a dedication of the Lutheran Church to the ideals of liberty and of service. Referring to the celebrated words of General Peter Mühlenberg at the outbreak of the Revolution, "There is a time to preach and a time to fight," Dr. Schmauk declared that "this is not the time and the pulpit is not the place for any American church to discuss the causes of war, nor to exercise the imagination upon hopes and dreams of peace. We are a loyal and law-abiding church. Never in our history were we known to be slackers. The Lutheran volunteers who have gone forth freely to follow the flag of their country are a great multitude." At the first session of the Convention, resolutions were unanimously adopted placing the Lutheran Church unreservedly behind the government in the prosecution of the war. "We pray Almighty God," read the resolutions, "to grant us, the American people, together with our allies, a complete and decisive victory over our enemies, in order that our ancient liberties may be preserved and deepened, and that justice, righteousness, and that freedom which is our sacred heritage, may be enjoyed by the nations of the earth."

The increasing recognition which women are receiving in the Lutheran Church was shown when the General Council agreed to give women a place on its important mission boards, with full voting power, "if it is found to be legal." The action came as a result of a request from the Women's Missionary Society. Hereafter the women of the church will not be called on merely to aid in raising mission funds, but will also have a voice in its administration and in determining mission policy.

SEVERAL notable gatherings were held during the course of the Lutheran convention. On Saturday afternoon a vast throng gathered at the campus of Mount Airy Lutheran Seminary to witness the unveiling of a $15,000 statue in memory of Mühlenberg. The monument was erected by the Ministerium of Pennsylvania, and is the work of the sculptor J. Otto Schweizer. A great mass meeting was held in the Metropolitan Opera House on Sunday evening, when nineteen speakers from various parts of the United States and Canada gave a bird's-eye view of the work of the General Council. The celebration came to a climax on the evening of October 31, the exact anniversary of the posting of Luther's theses, when two monster community meetings were held, one in the Academy of Music, the other in the Temple.

President Schmauk at the closing session of the convention said: "This meeting marks a new epoch in American Lutheranism. I believe the decisions made here mean a church resurgent. It means a church that shall be identified with loyalty and Americanism as long as it endures. Our church will stand in the front rank of war relief work; and when the war is over it will be in a position to engage in a great reconstructive work."

Why Abdominal Massage Keeps You Clean Inside

Physicians Make a Remarkable New Discovery

By J. G. BURNHAM

WHEN you bump your arm, your instinct tells you to rub the bruised spot. This brisk rubbing relieves the pain by restoring the normal, healthy circulation of the blood, revitalizing the cells and tissues which have been injured. This old-fashioned method of keeping the blood normally active has at last been applied in the treatment of constipation, auto-intoxication, and the many serious and minor ailments resulting therefrom. Massage, in simple language, is nothing but another form of exercise. A lively ten-mile walk will quicken the circulation, will expel the poisons of the system, will make you feel like a new person. Old fashioned, indeed, is the physician who underestimates the value of systematic exercise in fighting all those serious diseases and maladies that result directly from digestive disorders and intestinal poisoning. In fact, the best informed schools of medicine have for many years recommended some form of daily physical exercise to all sufferers from debility, mental depression, physical exhaustion, headaches, vertigo, backaches, colitis, lassitude, indigestion, diabetes and their complications; or, where time for such cannot be spared, then its concentrated substitute, massage. The primary object of quickening a sluggish blood circulation is to induce regular and normal action of the bowels and ejection from the body of its waste matter, which when retained in the colon generates poisons destructive to health and efficiency.

Intestinal activity depends upon proper developments of the abdominal muscles.

Not only is it now known that of all cases of sickness and disease, nine out of ten are due to internal uncleanliness, followed by colon poisoning, but it is also known that for the treatment of this causative condition, physics, laxatives, cathartics and other drugs are worse than worthless; they are habit-forming, pernicious and injurious for the simple reason that they are themselves poisonous. The problem confronting physicians and thousands of sufferers from chronic constipation and auto-intoxication (self-poisoning) has been to find some means for the self-application of stimulating and strengthening massage of the colon and abdominal region—a perfect substitute for time-consuming and therefore often impossible physical exercise—as well as something that would make it totally unnecessary to use harmful drugs.

A new and ideal substitute for time-consuming outdoor exercise.

To meet this demand there has been invented a new device, the Kolon Motor, for which the most remarkable results are being reported by leading physicians, sanatoriums, hospitals, gymnasiums and a large army of men and women who are using it in their own homes.

By its aid, normal and natural functioning of the bowels is instantly restored and resumed and the muscles of the intestines are exercised and strengthened to perform their duty without help. When the intestinal accumulations are promptly and effectually eliminated from the system, putrefaction and the formation of poisons is prevented and Nature quickly performs her work of reconstruction and repair of the tissues and organs of the entire body.

The effects of Kolon Motor Abdominal Massage might be compared to the usual forms of physical exercise so highly recommended, except that they are superior for the reason that the "treatments" are applied directly to the abdomen and intestines—the seat of practically all disease. Its advantage over manual (hand or osteopathic) massage lies in its economy and convenience, as the Kolon Motor massage is self-administered each day upon arising and retiring. A five minute "treatment" is sufficient. Moreover, although the Kolon Motor has been so successfully used in the treatment of disease, its value is incalculable when used daily for two or three minutes, to wake up the circulation in the morning, so filling you with energy, "pep" and vitality that work will melt under your touch—your brain will be clear as a bell · your whole system will show the result of this directly applied abdominal massage. The illustration on this page affords only an idea of this really wonderful new invention. A large picture of the Motor, with a full description, is included in a remarkable new book of health secrets, just published and which can be had free for the asking by addressing Martin's Method, Inc., Dept. 1511, 105 East 30th St., New York City. This booklet, entitled "Colon Cleanliness," contains some truly amazing discoveries on the cause, source and proper treatment of disease as reported by many eminent authorities in the medical world.

If request is made promptly, by letter or on the coupon below, anyone interested can arrange to try the KOLON MOTOR in his own home without obligation. This free trial offer, however, is being made for a short time only, and it is advisable to act promptly. Sending the coupon does not obligate you in the slightest and may be the means of starting you on the road to genuine health.

Good Morning, Family Circle!

Another Little Visit with Several Hundred Thousand Friends

YES, it was quite an occasion, when I tried the experiment the other day. The success of that "visit" is to me a rather overwhelming recollection. It was so pleasant all the way through, bringing me into such cordial relations with our good friends of the Family Circle on a bigger scale than ever before, that I have resolved to repeat it.

So here we are, editor and readers, all together again, hobnobbing over the wire. You know, there's really such a thing as the "telephone habit." A ministerial friend of mine likens it to prayer. "You get into the way of speaking your mind freely and unreservedly over the 'phone," he says, "and so it is with prayer. You just speak right out the innermost thoughts and best aspirations of your heart when you pray, and the Father of All hears everything, even though you may have simply formed the thought, without giving it utterance." Thank God for prayer, and that the "line is always working."

And surely there is need of prayer in these critical days. It is a time when Christian people should be united in their influence, in their petitions and in their actions. The nations are on trial and the days foretold by the prophets —the days of "overturning"—seem to be near at hand. In those wonderful articles on prophecy which Dr. Gray is now contributing to the Christian Herald, a great light is thrown on many things that, till now, have been regarded as among the mysteries. These articles, which are of vital interest to every Christian, are now being printed in booklet form and copies will be sent free to every new subscriber. Impress upon those friends whose subscriptions you hope to send us, the spiritual value of these remarkable articles, which are appearing just at the time when they are most needed by a Church which has too long neglected prophecy, and a world that seems to have well-nigh forgotten God.

But today, I've called you up specially to thank you for the splendid way you responded to the message I sent you over the 'phone. The Business Office tells me that the request to the Family Circle to adopt the motto "Win One," and for each member to send in a new subscriber, was followed by a regular shower of new subscriptions. Glorious! It makes me happy to know this, and I hope it will be kept up until every member of the Circle has done his or her "bit" by "Winning One." I look forward confidently to the day when we can have a round half-million in the Circle—all working for the advancement of the Kingdom.

My friend, the late E. O. Guerrant of Kentucky, devoted his life to urging everybody he knew to "Win One" from sin to salvation. He founded the Soul Winners' Society, which has evangelized the people of the hills and won multitudes to worthier lives. But several thousand years ago there was a pioneer who had the same idea.* Just turn to your Bible and see where it states that a reward greater than any shining cross, or glittering decoration won in battle, is due to those who are successful in turning many to righteousness.

Now, the business of the Christian Herald—the chief aim, its end and existence—is to make people better, to present the Gospel message in the clearest form and to win men and women to Christian service. There are thousands of good folks in every state who only need the word of encouragement to join the Family Circle, where they will receive a royal welcome.

But the Publisher is at my elbow. He wants to tell you of his plans for the coming season, so I will close by hoping to hear from all who read this message, telling me that they are ready to increase the Family Circle by "Winning One" new member. I will expect a favorable reply, and may again resort to the telephone to acknowledge your kindness.

Wonderful Egg Producer

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit-maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 6428 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million-dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" cost you nothing. Send a dollar today or ask Mr. Reefer for his Free Poultry book that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.

Mr. Hoover on Food Control

SPEAKING at a meeting of State Food Commissioners and his personal staff, Mr. Hoover gave a striking explanation of the part food control plays in war. He said the European nations went into the war giving little thought to the subject of food. Even Germany, with all its preparations, had not fully foreseen the significance of this factor. With millions of men taken from production and thousands of square miles of fertile fields laid waste by armies, the world's cupboard quickly began to develop a bareness like that of Mother Hubbard. Country after country "went to the cupboard to get a bone," and found a diminished supply.

This made it necessary to organize food supply and distribution, and the various countries tried various methods. They fixed maximum and minimum prices, regulated production and distribution, and put their people on rations. The best system, on the whole, is still that of Germany, and she has been able to maintain efficiency with a food supply which in some of her enemy countries might be most embarrassing. Russia, with perhaps the greatest possibilities of food production in Europe, did nothing at all, and out of Russia's food situation grew revolution.

Whether we like it or not, we must deal with the food problem of war in one of two ways. There is not enough food to go around, if we stick to the lavish methods of peace times. Rising prices make the purchasing power of money shrink and compel us to adjust the food supply to the world's appetite, either by controlling that supply in ways that lead to economy and make it suffice, or by letting wages rise as prices rise, to keep pace roughly with fluctuations. Even an amateur economist can see at a glance that food control is better than wage increase, because wage increase is a crude force operating slowly, unevenly and with great injustice and suffering to millions of workers. Therefore food control seems to be the lesser evil.

This viewpoint explains most of the work thus far done by the United States Food Administration. The farmer, the grain man, the miller, the baker, the packer, the grocer, the wholesaler and retailer, the traveling salesman and the canned goods broker have gone to Washington in bodies representing the best men and the best minds in their respective trades, and have conferred there, not only with the Food Administrator himself, but with leading men in their own lines who are acting on the Food Administration as volunteers.

"WHETHER we like it or not," they are told by Mr. Hoover, "this is the situation: Business cannot go on as usual in war times, because the law of supply and demand is thrown out of operation. These are the conditions and here is the only remedy that has been found in countries with greater experience in war than we have yet had. What do you think about it, gentlemen?"

What the business men think is shown in every case by their action in recognizing the necessity for food control. With sensible food control, it is possible to handle the other two outstanding problems of food supply in war. One is increased production and the other is the economical use of food. With stable prices, absence of speculation, and the temporary surrender of individual trade advantages, the farmer can have an assurance of prices ample enough to encourage larger planting and live-stock raising. And by these same safeguards thrown around the food supply, the consumer will be willing to economize in food and able to purchase the necessities of life at prices which are at least reasonable, and, what is more important, will not suffer wild fluctuations.

This is food control in a nutshell. Whatever fear or hostility there may be in the country over food control arises entirely from misunderstanding of what control really means, why it is necessary, and how it is being done.

I PUT PEPSIN INTO GUM

Pepsin had long been famous as a relief for indigestion. Yet no one had thought of using Pepsin in chewing gum.

As a food chemist I saw its wonderful possibilities. So I devised my own formula for gum. I included pure Pepsin and the finest of chicle. Thus I produced Beeman's—the Original Pepsin Chewing Gum.

As a preventive or relief for indigestion, or all other ailments induced by indigestion, I believe my chewing gum is unexcelled.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Our Soldier Boys read the Christian Herald with great delight. It is the only religious paper the boys read to any extent. I have five copies on hand now and they are nearly worn out and still they are being read every day.

Those five are old ones sent by friends in America unknown to me. They are the only ones we have had since I opened up here.

You would be surprised to know how few magazines we get. We must do something to get reading matter for them this Winter.

Can you help me in any way? I shall hope to hear from you and anything that you can do for us will be appreciated.

I have charge of two Y. M. C. A. Huts. Each hut is 40 x 100 feet in size. They are 1½ miles apart and every night till "Taps" sound are just packed with soldiers. We try to keep them busy and keep them pleasantly entertained, but we are a long distance from supplies. My mail is sent to me direct from Paris.

Yours sincerely,
SANFORD L. PORTER, Secy.,
31 Ave. Montaigue,
Paris, France.

IF you have a son, or a brother, or a sweetheart, or a friend who has been called for service, what better service could you render than to send him the Christian Herald every week? 52 issues for only $2.00. Or you can send it to him for 6 months (26 issues) for $1.00.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD WILL BE DELIVERED DIRECT TO THE CAMP

No matter where the soldier or sailor goes, the Christian Herald will follow him. The Post-Office will take care of that.

A GIFT CARD FOR THE DONOR

A neat gift card, giving the name of the donor, will be sent to the soldier or sailor for whom you order the Christian Herald.

FIRST COPIES OFF PRESS WILL GO TO THE SOLDIERS

Make certain that your soldier gets a clean new copy of the Christian Herald—as we will send him one of the first copies off the press.

WHAT A SMALL SUM WILL DO

- 25 cts. will supply a Testament to a Soldier or Sailor.
- $1.00 will furnish Testaments to five Soldiers or Sailors.
- $1.00 will send the Christian Herald direct to a Soldier for six months.
- $2.00 will send the Christian Herald direct to a Soldier for one year.
- YOUR OWN RENEWAL to the Christian Herald for one year, and the Christian Herald for one year to a Soldier or Sailor, both for $3.00, if sent at the same time.

Questions and Answers

MRS. C. C. McD., Celina, Texas. 1. Daniel was descended from one of the highest families of Judah, and some have even conjectured that he was of royal blood (Dan. 1 : 3). He was probably born at Jerusalem, but was taken to Babylon at an early age, and was there obliged with his three companions to enter the service of the royal court. 2. The word "seven" in Dan. 3 : 19 denotes the perfect number, that is, the oven was heated to the utmost degree. 3. In I Cor. 3 : 13-15, the apostle is using the symbol of the fire test so often employed in the Scriptures (Matt. 3 : 11; I Pet. 1 : 7) and carries out the idea enunciated by the Master in speaking of baptizing with fire and burning the chaff. In other words, unless man's works and righteousness are strong enough to withstand the severe test of the last judgment, they will not survive. The fire test of temptation, of troubles and tribulations, will determine of what kind man's righteousness is. If of the right kind, it will survive the blast; if not, it will perish. 4. In I Cor. 5 : 5 some form of excommunication is probably meant, and not an actual turning over to Satan.

Mrs. J. M. S., Valparaiso, Neb. Mayor John Purroy Mitchel of New York is not identical with John Mitchell, the labor leader who assisted Colonel Roosevelt in settling the coal strike.

G. B., Whitewood, S. D. There is no recorded evidence that a rainbow was visible from the earth before the Flood. Some commentators hold that the rainless conditions described in Gen. 2 : 6, "But there went up a mist from the earth," etc., lasted until the atmospheric change wrought by the Flood. The Bible (Gen. 9 :13-17) is very clear to the effect that God established the rainbow at that time as "the token of the covenant" between him and mankind.

Mrs. C. A. S., Springfield, Colo. Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, the President's wife, is a member of St. John's Episcopal Church of Washington, D. C.

Miss G. P., Touson, Md. After obtaining permission from Cyrus, the Jews in B. C. 536 began to colonize their native land. Cyrus granted assistance for the restoration of the temple and ordered that the temple utensils should be restored (Ezra 1 and 6). In the spring of B. C. 535 the second temple was begun with the aid of Phœnician workmen. The Jews having refused cooperation by the Samaritans, they were offended and induced King Artaxerxes to prohibit the building. In the second year of the reign of Darius Hystaspes, building was resumed and was completed in the sixth year of the reign of this king. According to Josephus, the temple was completed in the ninth year of the reign of Darius. The new temple did not compare with the old in size and splendor.

Mrs. R. B., South Meriden, Conn. Write to the Agricultural Department of your state.

Bessie A. There have always been doubters, like Thomas, who want to have special proof of things spiritual. But that does not necessarily condemn them. Christ's mild rebuke of Thomas shows that. Any one who, like you, reads the Word daily to receive light and comfort because she wants to believe and be at peace with God, is certainly not on the verge of being lost. The Spirit alone can give you delight in the Word and implant the desire for higher things (I Cor. 2 : 16).

Mrs. C. M. H:, Paoli, Ind. Dancing, while it may not in itself be necessarily sinful, is apt to degenerate into sin. Had promiscuous dancing as it exists today been prevalent in Bible times, it would unquestionably have been a subject of denunciation as sweeping as that applied to any of the vices of the time. The purpose of the Scripture is to give general principles for the new life, and so leave us the great benefit of deciding conscientiously for ourselves how to apply them. In modern dancing the evil so far overbalances the good that much of it is indefensible, and should not be countenanced by Christians. However, we cannot all think alike, and therefore we must be slow to judge any one for either dancing or allowing his children to dance. Of course, if by so doing he gives offense he does wrong, and one offending in that respect may thereby hurt his otherwise good influence on others. We are taught to "avoid even the appearance of evil," and it is a good rule to follow.

Miss Catharine H. Candee, an American missionary in China, writes us of a new use to which the pages of the Christian Herald are put in the Christian Alliance School for the Blind at Kwaiping. There are forty girls in the school, which is conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Weldon G. Smith. The children are taught to read by the Braille system of raised letters, the letters being a series of dots or perforations. It was found that the Herald's pages, when folded, exactly fitted the copying frames. Mrs. Smith, who has been a reader of the paper from childhood, found that its usefulness could be doubled by making it serve as copy books for Braille dictation to her blind pupils. Every page can be utilized to the full, even the covers. She could use a whole year's numbers to great advantage. Any friend interested in her work among the blind in China can address Mrs. Smith at Kwaiping via Hong Kong and West River, China.

W. J. W., Dodgeville, Wis. There is no evidence that the grain we send abroad is used in any way other than for food. It is certainly sent for that purpose alone. If you have evidence pointing to a contrary conclusion, we would suggest that it be sent to Mr. Hoover, in Washington.

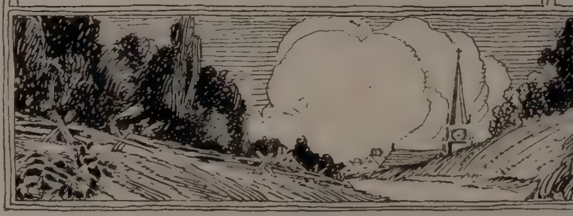
"Distress." The words of Jesus are full of glorious promise to all who will come to him with repentance. Divine mercy is without limitation and divine love and forgiveness are full and free to all who will ask for and accept them. "Whosoever will, may come." "Although your sins be like scarlet they shall be white as snow," is the ancient promise given by God to men; "though they be like crimson they shall be as wool." We have the Saviour's distinct assurance, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." Christ's death atones for all sin, except that of not accepting him. Whatever the sin may be, the sinner who comes to Christ, begging forgiveness, desiring to serve, and believing in his promises, need have no fear of rejection.

THANKSGIVING

Margaret E. Sangster

Red sumac flames across the hill,
And in each wood-fringed hollow;
The autumn breeze among the trees
Calls, "Follow, follow, follow!"
The pumpkins gleam like vagrant gold,
The grain is silver shining;
The very clouds above unfold,
To show a rosy lining!

Red sumac flames across the hill,
Where fading sunlight lingers,
And points the way for me to stray,
With soft, enchanted fingers-
And as I stand beside the way,
The world seems throbbing, living...
And there I feel God's love to day,
And thank him for Thanksgiving!



L. C., Narvon, Pa. Space is too restricted to allow the publication of Luther's theses. They dealt with the evils of penance and indulgences, as practiced in the Catholic Church at the time of Tetzel.

C. P. M., Detroit, Mich. Please ask if any reader of the Herald can give the hymn sung at the launching or the arrival of the first mission vessel, the Morning Star. It was, I think, in the fifties. I was a Sunday school teacher, and the children were giving for it. I know one verse. It is:

"'Tis the voice of little children,
Gently calling you to come
To the Saviour who hath bought you,
And gently calls you home.
'Twas for you He died."

This last line was sung twice.

Mrs. R. A. H., Topeka, Ind. We have no connection with the fund you mention.

Grace H., Portland, Ore., writes: "I enjoyed your article about women wearing birds and birds' feathers on their hats. Next, I would like to see a plea for the fur-bearing creatures, many of which are entirely harmless, and whose only crime is that of being created with a coat the beauty of which catches the eye of some vain, heartless woman, and the poor little animals are hunted to satisfy this craving, till many of them are almost exterminated from the earth. I do not believe God intended us to drive all the wild things from our forests; it seems to me they have a right to their lives also. Of course, in cold climates, and in our own winter weather, some furs and fur-lined coats are comfortable; but this silly fashion, or fad, of women wearing furs when the thermometer stands at 90 here in the shade, seems to me to be about the last word in foolishness. This custom prevailed out here on the coast all summer, whereas in this climate furs are rarely needed, even in winter. I know the Herald can't regulate fashions, but a plea from that paper would have great influence."

Mr. Edward S. Babcock, a prominent business man of Akron, Ohio, writes: "Recently, I suggested to the pastor of the church which I attend now and then, that he place a small box in the lobby of the church, so that patriotic people, who might be inspired by some of the sermons, could drop a coin into the box on their way out, the money to be used to buy Christmas presents for the men who have gone to the front from that church. The idea took hold in good shape, and they have collected quite a sum of money. In addition to Liberty Bonds and all other contributions which people are making to the war these days, all of us have a quarter of a dollar which we would be glad to drop into the box for a cause like the above. It occurred to me that if you place any value on suggestions from laymen, you might want to note this suggestion in your publication, and perhaps many thousands of dollars could be collected from churches as contributions for this most worthy cause."

We print our friend's happy idea and commend it to the attention of pastors and church officers. In these days of multiplied giving to many causes, we should not forget the brave young fellows who have gone from our own churches and from the circles of our acquaintance. It's an experiment well worth trying, and one which we believe every congregation would cordially approve and patronize.

Reader, Glasgow, Mont. 1. An "unbeliever" is one who does not believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ or in his mission of salvation to the world. In a broader sense, he is one who does not believe in God, or in revealed religion. 2. See II Cor. 6 : 14, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers." Union in marriage between belief and unbelief can hardly fail to be productive of unhappiness.

J. L. S., Davenport, Fla. 1. Do you know whether Jerusalem is in the jaws of famine, and if so, will you accept money sent in for relief? Of all the starving countries which do you think the most needy? 2. Will the Christian Herald publish Dr. Gray's articles on prophecy in book form?

1. Our latest advices from Jerusalem, which we published in a recent issue, show that food conditions there are very critical. Further, if the extensive military movements which, according to the cables, seem to be in preparation, should take place, conditions will become even worse for a time. Meanwhile, we consider Jerusalem, and for that matter all of Palestine, deserving of generous relief. Our readers have sent many helpful contributions for the ancient land and its people. 2. Dr. Gray's articles will be published in booklet form. Due announcement will be made in good time.

Margaret, Romney, W. Va. Write to the Boards of Trade of Tallahassee or Jacksonville, Fla., of Denver, Colo., and of Los Angeles, Calif., for the statistics you require.

B. B., Cherry Vale, Kan. 1. Boanerges ("sons of thunder") was a surname given by Christ to James and John on account of their fervent, impetuous spirit (see Luke 9: 54; Mark 9 : 38; Matt. 20 : 20). There is some uncertainty as to the original Syro-Chaldee word used, although it is generally supposed to have been a term sufficiently well understood in Galilee, and meaning "sons of commotion," or "sons of tumult." 2. Jericho was a strong city, and some idea of the size of its walls may be gathered from the fact that houses could be built upon them (see Joshua 2 : 15). Even Josephus, the famous Jewish historian, gives no estimate of the height or thickness of the walls.

H. A. S., Rock Island, Ill. Nothing is to be gained by such a discussion as you suggest, especially as it could not affect the situation in any way.

E. M. C., Imperial, Kan. 1. No such passage in the Bible. 2. Write to Medical Record, New York, for the information.

The Welcome Hour of Food Distribution in an Armenian Refugee Camp

$25,000 for Bible Land Sufferers

Thanksgiving Offering of Christian Herald Readers to the Destitute in Armenia, Syria and Palestine

AT the beginning of winter, the condition of the refugees of Western Asia, from the Caucasus to Damascus and from Beirut to the southern border of Palestine, is one which should arouse the sympathy of the Christian world. Hundreds of thousands of these unfortunates have already perished in the long journeys across the desert regions in the late summer. Their bones lie bleaching along the wilderness of Armenia and Syria. The survivors are in a pitiful plight. These refugees, to the number of over half a million, are divided into parties of several thousand each, distributed over territory hundreds of miles in extent. Their Moslem persecutors have made no provision either for their shelter or food, and but for the generosity of America, which has supplied a large part of the funds raised to procure food for them—and the devotion of the missionaries who have organized the purchase, transportation and distribution of relief supplies—there would have been few indeed left to tell the tale of what had once been the Armenian nation. Among the refugees are many thousands of Syrian and Greek exiles, who have suffered from the same ruthless persecution.

AT this critical season, an appeal is issued by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief in behalf of these multitudes who are looking to the great Republic of the West as their sole hope. This appeal says:

"The refugees of Western Asia are now facing the even more terrible ordeal of a winter which in many parts of the territory is extremely rigorous. Homeess, unthinkably destitute, with the prospect of starvation ahead of them, these Armenian, Syrian and Greek exiles find but one ray of light in the leaden sky which darkens their world.

"From America there came enough help to keep ife in the bodies of these sufferers during the summer months. With pitiful faces and eyes that seem to say, If you fail us, only death waits,' they turn to America to again help them through the coming winter, and to give them a chance to become once more self-supporting, independent peoples. Their gratitude is pathetic.

"If help is not sent soon, there will remain no people to be helped. All money which the committee collects is forwarded to relief stations and used by responsible American distributors for the purchase of food and shelter for the refugees. Not one cent is taken out for administrative expenses, which are met privately.

"Four hundred thousand or more orphans are today destitute in Bible lands. A missionary, just returned from Syria, tells of passing through a village whose houses were all deserted, with the exception of one little cottage in whose doorway sat a tiny girl. The child had the face of an old woman as she rocked back and forth droning 'I'm hungry! I'm hungry!' Multiply this instance by thousands; add it to the cases of thousands more who have been gathered into orphanages; and some idea of the plight of the children in Western Asia today may be gathered. Die by the thousands they must, unless help can reach them soon. The death-rate in the Lebanon alone last winter was a thousand a day. It will be vastly greater this winter unless we send relief and send it very quickly."

MISS MARY BUTTERFIELD, a Christian Alliance missionary who has cooperated with the American Colony in Jerusalem in its relief work, writes that thousands of Armenian refugees had come from east of the Jordan and were living under the open sky with scant clothing and almost no food. Some have died and others were dying. Mothers were giving birth to babies for whom there was not an article of clothing. She tells how an effort was made to help these apparently forsaken ones. She writes: "Often these refugees would come into the city and attend our meetings. Their stories were most pitiful. They would say, 'You are Americans; we belong to an American church.' We heard of one place where young girls stood so fearlessly for Christ that they won the admiration of their persecutors, and after sore tests were permitted to return to their friends. Others who did not stand true are living lives of misery today. But the blood of the martyrs in many districts is calling aloud to God."

Dr. Reynolds, an American Board missionary of long experience in Armenia and Syria, writing from Erivan, in the Russian Caucasus, says that the missionaries there are actively engaged in sheltering and caring for those who have been made orphans by the war and the terrible religious persecutions which have been let loose in the last three years. He estimates that there are in that section fifteen to twenty thousand fatherless, and often motherless, children, many of whom are being adopted as far as the means of the missionaries permit. Dr. Reynolds has seventy-eight of an orphan family on his list at Erivan, and sixty more at Alexandropol. Similar conditions prevail at almost all the mission stations, for it is a time when every missionary feels that his last limit of resources in sight has been reached, and that he must now look to God and the American people to avert a tragedy of suffering that would sadden the whole world.

THE missionaries in Western Persia report 40,000 in desperate need, foodless, without clothing or bedding. Seventy-five per cent. of these are widows and orphans, and the remainder aged and infirm. The numbers are increasing daily. W. T. Ellis cables that at Urumia "refugees from mountain villages living in shelter on stones, indescribable in rags, amid starvation, sickness and filth, compete with the street dogs for the offal."

United States Consul Jackson, Aleppo, Syria, reports 210,000 or more destitute in that city and vicinity, with no food resources who, if relief stops, "will disappear from the face of the earth."

Summarizing their advices from all the fields of suffering, Caucasus, Armenia and Syria, Palestine and Persia, the American Committee states the situation as follows:

Region	Destitute Survivors	Orphans
Asia Minor	500,000	200,000
Syria, including Palestine	1,200,000	75,000
Caucasus	350,000	100,000
Persia	90,000	25,000
Totals	2,140,000	400,000

The cost of sustaining life varies throughout the entire field, averaging not less than $5 per month per person. The majority of the destitute, apart from those who have been cared for through the relief fund in the missionaries' hands, are subsisting on local charity, and roots, leaves and even carrion. The Committee is convinced that, to prevent widespread death by starvation and disease during the winter months, very extensive relief will have to be forwarded immediately. The Christian Herald, in behalf of these unfortunate Christians, makes appeal to its readers to remember them not only in their prayers but in their benefactions during the coming months.

It is impossible for any one claiming the name of Christian, and professing to be a follower of Him who "went about doing good," to turn a deaf ear to this appeal. The readers of this journal have never failed to respond to an emergency like this. They have already given liberally to Armenia and Syria and Palestine, and the "Holy City" of Jerusalem, and now, at the crisis, they are asked to continue the good work in the hope that, with that cooperation of God's people in other lands and communities, the great peril may pass, and that these unfortunates may be saved from starvation. Of this helpless multitude a large majority are women and children—widows and orphans, indeed, of the war. They are our brothers and sisters, of whom the Master said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me."

THANKSGIVING is at hand. Let us make it a memorable Thanksgiving by helping to save them. The Christian Herald, in behalf of the contributors to the Widows and Orphans Fund, has placed in the hands of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief the sum of $25,000, to be applied to this most worthy cause. Every dollar of this Thanksgiving offering is the gift of some golden-hearted man or woman who has read the appeals that have appeared in these columns from time to time, and has made a gift to the fund. They, with thousands of others, have already helped the sufferers in Belgium and other European countries. Now their united gifts will be employed in a "big drive" to save these people in the ancient Bible lands. The American Committee, which operates through the various missionary groups in the field, is fully organized for this work and has already done splendid service in saving life and ameliorating suffering.

This Thanksgiving offering from Christian Herald readers will mean life and a measure of comfort to thousands, not only in Syria and Armenia, but in Palestine, where the Relief organization is also working effectively. It will mean food for many a destitute home in the land which is so dear to every Christian heart. It will bring material help and spiritual blessing to thousands in Jerusalem, where the American Colony, which has already done a vast amount of relief work amid many dangers, will supervise the distribution, and see that every dollar counts in feeding the hungry and sheltering the homeless. This Offering will bring to these lands and their suffering peoples something of the Thanksgiving spirit, and will help them to feel that the Christian heart of America has them in mind at this season of grateful remembrance.

Appalling Destitution in Syria

IT was always the boast of the people of Syria that whatever happened they would at least have enough to eat. The wheat fields of Hauran and of Moab, the olive orchards of Samaria and Shweifet, the grapes and figs of Lebanon have always produced so abundantly that it has been a land of plenty, in reality a land flowing with milk and honey. But the impossible has come to pass. Paper money has depreciated to fifteen per cent. of the value of gold, with the government insisting on purchasing all supplies with paper valued at par.

These things that have paralyzed business, carried off wage-earners, and destroyed transportation, together with failure of rains and woeful mismanagement and wicked speculation in food supplies on the part of officials, have brought Syria and Palestine not merely to the verge of starvation but to a point where famine, the most acute, is carrying off women and children daily by the thousand.

Reports written as late as September 11 state: "The spirit of discouragement is gaining more and more on the people, and they feel that if nothing develops in the way of release this fall, most of the people are doomed to starvation." Even last winter, as one passed through the streets of Beirut, it was like a city in mourning, and a constant moan and wail could be heard on every hand: "O God, I'm hungry! I'm hungry!"

WHAT is true of Beirut is also true of Jerusalem, Damascus, Sidon, Tripoli, and the villages of the Lebanon Mountains. The most conservative estimates place the number of destitute men, women, and children in Syria and Palestine at 1,200,000. Last spring in the Lebanon Mountains alone 1,000 a day were dying from hunger or diseases directly due to malnutrition. Not merely the very poor, but the laborers, masons, tradesmen, the yeomanry of the land, are helpless and perishing.

It is a common sight to see a group of three or four children, whose parents have starved or died from typhus, sleeping in the ditches by the roadside, or huddled under a projecting balcony, clothed in rags, barefooted, their only food that which can be extracted from the gutters or the chance grains of barley found in the droppings of the horses.

These scenes are not imagination, but are testified to by American missionaries and United States officials only recently returned to this country. At least 75,000 children below the ages of twelve or thirteen are in Syria today, with no parents to provide for them and no food but that which they can find in the rubbish heaps. And the greater part of these have come from homes once well supplied with all comforts of life. This is the modern story of the Jericho road, where not one man but a whole people have been robbed and beaten and left by the wayside to die. This is the land where it was said, "I was hungry and ye gave me to eat."

Doings of the Evangelists

WHEN Dr. Milford H. Lyon and his singer, Harold Clase, arrived in Europe, they sent back one word, "safe"; but that meant everything to their families and friends. They are now busy with their work among the soldiers.

Evangelist E. E. Hendrick recently held a successful meeting with two Presbyterian churches in Evansville, Ind. A. L. Carter will be with him again.

Mathis and Vessey have held a good meeting in Wessington Springs, S. D.,

Dr. J. Ross Stevenson, president of Princeton Theological Seminary, who has been giving half his time to the Y. M. C. A., has been released from active duties at the seminary for the present year, and will be associated with Mr. Wilder in the direction of the war work of the Association.

Billy Sunday's campaign in Los Angeles had the usual accompaniments of big crowds, great interest, intense enthusiasm, and widespread results. At least thirty thousand signed cards in the meetings, though these do not represent all the benefits of the campaign, and already conservation plans are being used to make the "follow-up" work effective. The meetings for men in the Garrick Theater attracted large crowds. Mr. Sunday and members of the party made numerous trips about southern California by automobile, thus reaching other thousands.

Evangelist C. J. Balfe has given up his work with the Cathedral Shelter in Chicago to do army work under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A.

The O. E. Williams party is now holding meetings in Carlisle, Pa; following a successful campaign in the First United Brethren Church of Shamokin, Pa.

The Baptists have seventeen preachers employed in evangelizing the Mexicans of Texas. Last year they watched over sixty-six churches and stations, organized ten Sunday schools, started six new churches and received 492 into church membership. Thousands of Mexican refugees have heard the Gospel for the first time in these churches. The family of Villa attends one of these churches in San Antonio.

E. K. Towle conducted a series of meetings in October in Sadorus, Ill. Twenty-five persons united with the church the last day of the meeting.

F. H. Ream, of Kansas City, reports good results in his meetings at Dalton and Kearney, Mo., and Altamount, Kan.

Harold L. Stephens and party conducted a thorough and successful union meeting in Stratford, Ont. There were over a thousand conversions in five weeks. Mr. Stephens spent a week in the Moody Tabernacle, Chicago, while Pastor Paul Rader was conducting a union meeting at Racine, Wis.

The C. F. Weigle party conducted a very successful tabernacle meeting at Ridgefield Park, N. J.

R. Sam Kirkland is now engaged in evangelistic work in Bourbon, Ill.

The Slocum-Smith party reports successful union meetings in Middletown and Dalton, N. Y. They are now in Laurens, N. Y.

W. P. Nicholson who has done much evangelistic work in this country and in Australia, has been appointed as evangelist to work under the direction of the Bible Institute of Los Angeles.

E. S. Stucker reports successful union meetings in Sedan and Dexter, Kan.

M. B. Williams, president of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, was one of the speakers at the World's Purity Congress, Louisville, Ky., last month.

The Franklin-Leonard party on October 28 closed a meeting at Stockport, Iowa, which in spite of difficulties, was marked by excellent results. A number were converted and many testimonies of great blessing and helpfulness came from Christians who participated. On November 4 the party began a meeting at Ashton, Idaho, a new town in the midst of Mormon territory.

B. F. Richer conducted a meeting in the United Brethren Church in Warsaw, Ind., in November. He is now in a union meeting in New Haven, Ohio.

Mrs. Daisy D. Barr and party have made a successful community tabernacle campaign in Advance, Ind. About five hundred people made decisions. The party is now in South Bend, Ind.

E. B. Westhafer lately held a successful evangelistic meeting in Huntington, Ind., in the same church in which he was pastor when he began his ministry. In November he conducted a meeting in Kansas City, Mo.

Andrew Johnson recently held successful meetings at Mooers and Au Sable Forks, N. Y.

The George T. Stephens party reports an inspiring campaign in Pine Bluff, Ark. In addition to numerous conversions there were many reconsecrations.

The A. J. Fitt party just closed a union meeting at Hollis, Kan. Twenty-three joined the churches on the last Sunday.

Why not have a revival of religion in your church or in your community? Redeem the time, and recruit for Christ. Excellent evangelists, Bible teachers, and Gospel singers are available for such work. Write to the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, Winona Lake, Ind., for particulars, giving information about your local conditions.

Parley E. Zartmann.

(An announcement of future engagements of the evangelists will be published next week.)

Making Steel for the War

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1917, by Frank G. Carpenter

I HAVE come to Gary, Ind., from the iron mines at the head of Lake Superior on a vessel loaded with ore to the great steel plants here at the foot of Lake Michigan. My steamer had a cargo of 12,000 tons. She unloaded this in less than five hours and the ore is already on its way to the furnace. By the time this letter is published it will have been made into steel, and will have gone out with other sister cargoes into steel rails, big guns and shells and the thousand and one other forms in which Uncle Sam is using steel in our fight with the Germans.

Last year, when we were still out of the war, we sold to England and France four or five million tons of steel shells and 766,000,000 pounds of barbed wire for entanglements. That steel would have filled a train of fifty-ton cars as long as from New York to Chicago, and the barbed wire would have been enough to build a nine-strand hog-tight fence around the world on the line of the equator. Those were the sales of one year and of only two items. They were made when we had not yet begun to fight. Now we are in the struggle with every atom of muscle and every bit of machinery we can command, the government is taking the produce of all the steel plants, and the output will be greater than ever before. The plants are now backed by more than four billions of capital. Every worker in steel and iron has been drafted into the industrial army and they number today more than a million.

The long line of furnaces which work day and night, year in and year out

Away down here, at the foot of Lake Michigan, are two of the biggest camps of this army of iron and steel. Although officered by the United States Steel Corporation, they are now under the government and they are fighting the battle after the most improved methods of modern efficiency. It is to show you something of what they are doing that I have come here to South Chicago and Gary. But first let me show you how strategically the two camps are located and how well they are fitted for waging the war. They are situated on the deep waters of Lake Michigan, where the ore from the mountains of Lake Superior can be shot from the ships almost into the furnaces, where coal and limestone can be cheaply secured, and where the steel products can be rapidly transported to any part of the world

The ore steamer unloaded and ready to seek a new cargo, while the ore she carried passes from the endless belt conveyors, which scooped it out of her hold, to the cars which dump it into the ever-hungry furnaces

THE South Chicago plant is a part of the city of Chicago. This section has about eighty thousand inhabitants, and the most of them are supported by the steel works. The town of Gary is just across the Indiana boundary, about thirty miles from Chicago. It has fifty-five thousand inhabitants, and there are about twelve thousand men at work in the mills and the furnaces.

The South Chicago plant is that of the Illinois Steel Company. Its buildings already cover about four hundred acres, and it has more than twice as much more land adjoining it which will eventually be used for the works. The Gary plant belongs to the Indiana Steel Company, another branch of the United States Steel Corporation. It is already three miles long and a mile and a quarter in width, and this whole territory is covered with structures that are very mountains of steel. The towers and turrets of its furnaces stand out like mighty castles against the sky and its huge buildings are filled with masses of machinery that seem to move on ball bearings. A network of railroad tracks runs in and out through the works, and great pipes of steel, some of them so large that a Pullman train could pass through them without touching the walls of the pipe, wind in and out, close to the ground and high above it, carrying millions of feet of gas to the various parts of the works. I do not know the cost of the South Chicago plant, but it has run far up into the tens of millions of dollars. The machinery of the Gary plant alone has cost more than one hundred and forty millions, and the United States Steel Corporation is now spending millions more.

Today, owing to the demands of the times, new construction is going on at both plants. Gary is building four new blast furnaces and a great establishment for making wheels of forged steel. She is putting in fourteen boilers to utilize the waste heat of her open-hearth furnaces and is installing new engine shops, new boiler shops and other works for increasing the by-products. At the Illinois steel plant they are installing electric open hearth furnaces, extending their foundries, building great gas-driven blowing engines, and adding to their establishments for turning out Bessemer steel.

I despair of making you see the immensity of these mighty creations and the wonderful equipment they furnish for fighting the war. Take the blast furnaces. The Illinois and Indiana steel companies have twenty-nine, which are now blazing away night and day. They work holidays and Sundays, year in and year out, and since they have been built many of them have been smelting iron continuously for 98 per cent. of their running time.

EACH of these furnaces is as big around as a haystack and as tall as an eight-story house. It has four great stoves, almost as big and twenty feet higher, which heat the air blast to a temperature of from twelve hundred to sixteen hundred degrees before it is forced into the furnace, and it holds a charge of about seventeen hundred tons of ore, limestone and coke, which this heat turns to liquid. The furnaces of the Illinois Steel Company alone are now turning out more than two million tons of pig iron a year. Steelmaking is rapidly becoming an exact science, and everything is tested by chemical and physical analysis. There are more than one hundred chemists at Gary alone, and there is practically an equal number at South Chicago. Their work goes on day and night.

The war is rapidly increasing the by-product coke ovens. I found this so in Alabama, and it is being carried on to an even greater extent at the foot of Lake Michigan. There are by-product coke plants at both South Chicago and Gary. The Gary plant is one of the largest in the country. It consumes 10,000 tons of coal every twenty-four hours, and the coal is the best that can be obtained. It comes from the Pocahontas mines, the product of which is equal to that of the Cardiff mines of England.

This coal is of about the same character as that which was formerly used in the old beehive ovens, resulting in a product of coke equal to 60 or 65 per cent. of the coal. The remaining 30 per cent. of the coal was lost, going out in volatile gases which dissolved in the air. It took seventy-five hours to reduce

THE HEART'S THANKS

By Charles Grant Miller

A FATHER gave to each of his two little sons a pony and cart. And in the evening he asked them how they had enjoyed them.

"I have had such fine fun every minute of the day," exclaimed one. "Oh, how I thank you!"

A shadow fell upon the father's face. He turned to the other. "And you?" he asked.

"First," said the boy, "I took the little cripple across the street out for a bully ride. Then I hauled a tired washwoman's basket for her. Then I drove on an errand for mother. And the rest of the day I loaned the pony and cart to little sister. I give you, dear father, the thanks of all of these."

The father's face lit up like a lantern.

DARE we think that God is pleased with our thanks for health, strength and prosperity when we have used these precious gifts only for ourselves and lent none to the sick and weak?

Of what avail, in the Mind on high, is strength not used to help bear some brother's burden?

Can our thanks for plenty and content sound sincere to the ear of the Infinite, while the alleys behind our pleasant dwellings are wretched with poverty and despair?

Thanks that are empty words of the mouth, with no self-sacrificing deeds back of them to set the heart-strings into vibration — can such thanks as these be heard above the ceaseless moan of the world's woe, which we have not sought to still?

No doubt we have remembered God; we have prayed faithfully, thanking him for blessings and asking for more; we have been regular in worship at the church we have helped to build to his glory; but have we remembered that every home where want or sickness or misfortune dwells is also a place for us to go and worship in, and that a kindly word and a helpful lift are the sweetest thanks to God?

Mere thanks of the mouth are but mockery. Let us make them real—a delight to earth and heaven.

Let us take our strength to the weak and fallen, and let their thanks be ours.

LET us carry our content to the widow and the fatherless, whose faintest whisperings are heard on high.

Let us go with our thanks into the hospitals, and there see thanks signaled straight to the heart of God from the brightened eyes of pain.

The world is full of the good, the bright and the beautiful, in spite of war, in spite of sin; and there is fault in the eye that does not see it, and wrong in the heart that does not appreciate.

Let us joyously give thanks for life and love, for home and family, for prosperity and plenty, for health and hope. For all the joys of life which no man can measure, but also for all its sorrows whose hidden blessings no mind but that divine can estimate. For friends who cheer us; for foes who put us on our mettle. For triumphs that give us confidence; for defeats that quicken our resolves. For successes sunshine; for failures that bring us revivifying dews of night.

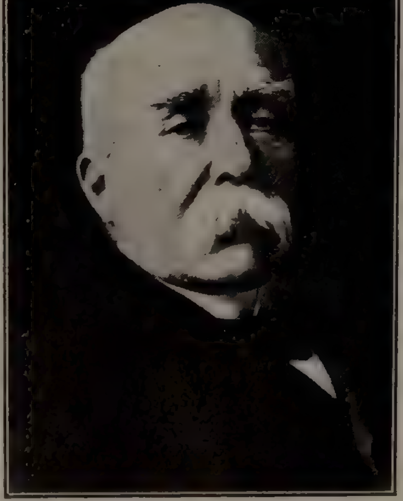
PLEASURES, prosperity, all the material blessings that abound—even ingrates can give thanks for these. Let us, at least this once in the long year, look deep into the heart of our sorrows, our failures, our disappointments, our illnesses, and see if there does not lie there, as within the hard, bitter hull of the nut, some good kernel that is sweet and wholesome and nourishing. And so give thanks!

The rich, the well, the happy—surely they need not be taught to give thanks! No; it is the voice of praise that wells up through tears from the heart that aches, to which angels lean and listen.

For what we have got out of this world it is easy to be grateful. But for what we have been able to give to it, of goods, of sympathy, of sacrifice, of cheer, of uplift, of soul-stuff—for this we may give thanks that will blend, infinitely sweet, into the eternal music of the spheres.

So each of us, as different gems have different powers to reflect the light—let us give thanks.

A Week in the World's News



M. Georges Clemenceau

Premier, who was chosen to reconstruct the French Cabinet

THE PRESIDENT AND LABOR. President Wilson addressed the National Convention of the American Federation of Labor at Buffalo on November 12. He asked the delegates to forget the fact that he was introduced as the President of the United States and regard him only as a fellow-citizen who had come to speak, not words of authority, but words of counsel. He outlined the wonderful economic success of Germany before the war and declared that she had had "a place in the sun," but she, not satisfied with it, sought to dominate the labor of the world. He declared that German political control of the territory comprised within the present Central Empire's group would be a standing menace to the world. "But," he declared, "I believe that the spirit of freedom can get into the hearts of Germans and find as fine a welcome there as it will find in any other hearts; but the spirit of freedom doesn't suit the plans of the Pan-Germans. Power cannot be used with concentrated force against free peoples, if it is used by free people." He referred to the peace suggestions from the Central Powers, but declared: "Any man in America or anywhere else who supposes that the free industry and enterprises of the world can continue if the Pan-German plan is achieved and German power fastened upon the world, is as fatuous as the dreamers of Russia. What I am opposed to is not the feeling of the pacifists, but their stupidity. . . . I want peace, but I know how to get it, and they don't." The President continued: "If we are the true friends of freedom—our own or anybody else's—we will see that the power of this country, the productivity of this country, is raised to its absolute maximum, and that absolutely nobody is allowed to stand in the way of it." He declared that Americans must stand together and pull together, and decried the mob spirit which had cropped out now and then since the beginning of the war, declaring of all men who joined mobs that he did not recognize them as worthy of the free institutions of the United States. He said in closing: "I am with you if you are with me, and the only test of being with me is not to think about me personally at all, but merely to think of me as the expression for the time being of the power and dignity and hope of the United States." The President's appeal for patriotic support of the government by labor could not have been more timely, for strikes in connection with various construction projects were delaying necessary government work, and the trainmen, conductors and firemen of American railroads were taking a secret vote on a proposal to demand increased wages of the railroads, with the implied threat to strike if the demand was not granted. Following the President's address, leaders of the building trades at Buffalo called off strikes at Newark, Boston, Waterford, Conn., and elsewhere, and the railway men were reported as agreeing to submit their cause to federal mediators before carrying it to extreme ends and later as willing to put their case in the hands of the President. In a letter to William L. Chambers, Commissioner of Mediation and Arbitration, the President suggested that he would not permit the paralyzing of the transportation system by a strike, but would make use of the authority of the government to take over the railroads and operate them as a national enterprise in time of war.

CHINA PROTESTS. China doesn't propose to be handed about by other nations. The Chinese government, being informed of the Lansing-Ishii agreement between the governments of the United States and Japan, filed with the State Department in Washington a statement of its views in which it declared that "the principle adopted by the Chinese government toward the friendly nations has always been one of justice and equality, consequently the rights enjoyed by the friendly nations derived from the treaties have been constantly respected. Hereafter, the Chinese government will still adhere to the principles hitherto adopted, and hereby it is again declared that the Chinese government will not allow itself to be bound by any agreement entered into by other nations."

RELEASING NEUTRAL SHIPS. It was announced on November 13 that negotiations with northern European neutrals and with Japan for tonnage had reached the final stage, and that the vessels concerned would either go into transatlantic service or into service that would release American ships. The European neutrals agreed to turn over to the United States and the Allies ships in exchange for foodstuffs, while Japan sold a large amount of tonnage outright in exchange for steel ship plates. Foodstuffs will be permitted to go from America to northern neutrals in sufficient quantities to supply demonstrated needs, the neutrals agreeing that none of such foodstuffs shall be re-exported to Germany, or take the place of other foodstuffs so exported. The total amount of tonnage added to the active fleets of the world by this agreement is estimated at 400,000 tons.

RAILROADS AND THE WAR. In the hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commisssion regarding the proposed increase of 15 per cent. in freight rates the interesting suggestion was made by Samuel Rea, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, that for the period of the war all loans required by the railroads for new construction and equipment should be made by the government in order to clear the market for the sale of government war loans. The attorneys representing the shipping interests concurred in this suggestion. The Railway War Board also announced that the railways were now carrying 16 per cent. more freight traffic than at the same time in 1916, and 50 per cent. more than in 1915, with practically no increase in facilities or equipment, and that there had also been an increase in passenger traffic, besides which it had been necessary for the railroads to transport more than a million troops.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Secretary McAdoo announced on November 14 that the cost of the war is running below the estimates, the War Department expenditures being fifty per cent. less than had been estimated by the Department. He said that for the four-month period, ending October 31, the ordinary expenditures of the government had been $1,296,000,000, or at the rate of $324,000,000 a month, while the actual credits to the Allies had averaged about $500,000,000 per month. . . . The forty-one suffragists who were arrested on Saturday, November 11, for picketing the White House were released on Monday on parole, under suspended sentences. Thirty-one of them immediately returned to the charge and were rearrested, receiving sentences ranging from three days to six months. . . . The War Industries Board is planning to establish a bureau which will frame a plan for the eliminating of non-essential businesses with the least possible disturbance to the country's commerce. . . . Villista troops on November 14 captured the town of Ojinaga, Mexico, Federal troops defending the town fleeing to the American side of the Rio Grande, where they surrendered their arms and were interned under guard. . . . The National Diocesan Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of New York on November 15 passed a resolution recommending that Congress adopt prohibition as a war measure. . . . Henry Ford has joined the staff of the Shipping Board. He will introduce into the task of shipbuilding the multiple-production methods by which he has built up his automobile industry. . . . Premier Tuan Chi Jui of China, with his entire cabinet, handed his resignation to President Feng Kwo Chang on November 16. It was suggested that the new Prime Minister would be Hsu Shih Chang, whose cabinet would be a coalition, including representatives from south and central China. Later it was announced that President Feng had refused to accept Tuan's resignation. . . . The arrangement with Japan for the exchange of ship plates for ships was refused by Japan on November 17.

American soldiers about to go to the trenches in France, returning to camp after a day of training

Shells Kill Americans. The sector held by American troops in France during the past week has seen patrol and artillery fighting. One American gun was put out of action by an enemy shell, and there were a number of casualties among the American troops, some men dying of wounds. The French general commanding the sector has cited fifteen American officers and soldiers, including three who were killed, for excellent military qualities and for bravery displayed in the resistance to the German trench raid.

Second Bible Picture Study. Participants in our Second Bible Picture Study will be pleased to hear this important news—we expect to have received, by the time this notice meets your eye, the complete list of best verses selected by the Committee of Judges! So it should appear in the Christian Herald within a short time.

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

FIGHTING on the western front was mostly of a routine character. On the British portion of that front an unsuccessful attempt was made by the Germans on Monday, November 12, to recapture a portion of the high ground to the northeast of Paesschendael.

The U-boat toll of British merchantmen for the week ending November 10 was the smallest on record. Only one ship over 1,600 tons is reported sunk, and but five under that tonnage. The French lost two ships over 1,600 tons.

It is still impossible to say anything definite about the Russian interior situation.

Various reports from Russia on November 16 indicated that the Bolsheviki still held Petrograd, but that Kerensky was somewhere in the neighborhood of Gatchina, having been twice repulsed in attempts to take the capital; that fighting was proceeding in Moscow, and that Kiev was under control of the provisional government.

Later news indicated that Kerensky's army and his staff had deserted him and that Kerensky had disappeared. The Bolsheviki were apparently in control of Petrograd, and a truce had been declared in Moscow. General Kaledines and his Cossacks were reported in control of the coal regions, which gave them the power to dictate the movements of Russia's railways. There was a shadowy report of an army from the front marching on Petrograd, with a suggestion that Kerensky might be at its head; but the general complexion of events was that Kerensky had failed, and that Russia was in search of the strong man who should be able to command.

Maximalist troops were reported on the same day to have effected a coup d'état in Finland, seizing all official institutions and dissolving the Finnish Senate and Diet. It was announced that the old Diet with a Socialist majority would be reconvened under the leadership of a Finnish Socialist, Tokoi.

BOTH in Mesopotamia and southern Palestine during the past week, the British continued to improve their positions, their gains being largest on the south Palestine front. Here the Turks are being slowly pushed back by the British to the line behind the northern branch of the river Wadi Sukereir to the southeast, covering Beit Gibrin and the town of Hebron. During the entire week the Turks have been falling back toward this line, constantly harrassed by aerial bombardment by the British, whose warships in the Mediterranean have been continually shelling the Turkish troops retiring north along the coast. The British lost a monitor and a destroyer, sunk by the reply fire of the Turkish shore batteries. The British, on November 17, occupied Jaffa, the port of Jerusalem.

The political situations of France, Italy and Great Britain are all three very tense. Announcement of the creation of the Inter-Allied Council as noted last week was received in the three interested nations with marked disfavor, both by public and press. As a first result, the ministry of Professor Painlevé in France fell. In England public opinion also manifested itself as strongly adverse to the Council. The subject was brought up in Parliament, November 14, and the situation was so threatening that Lloyd George agreed to set aside the following Monday night for a general debate on the subject. In Italy the ministry is also in very deep water. The unanimous objection to the proposed council is that it would put the army and navy under the control and in the power of foreigners, whose decision on a given question would override that of the country's own General Staff.

President Wilson was reported on November 15 to have cabled Colonel House in London that "The United States government considers that unity of plan and control between all the Allies and the United States is essential in order to achieve a just and permanent peace."

Georges Clemenceau succeeded on November 15 in completing a cabinet to succeed the Painlevé ministry. M. Clemenceau himself assumed the Ministry of War, with Stephen Pichon as Foreign Minister.

It was announced on November 15 that Lord Northcliffe, recently returned from his special mission in America, had been offered the post of Air Minister, to head the new Department of Aeronautics. Lord Northcliffe, in a letter to Premier Lloyd George, refused to accept the post, declaring that he could not serve with the present government, severely criticising the conduct of the war by the Lloyd George cabinet. He threw a bombshell into the center of things British by declaring that unless better coordination of effort was soon achieved among the Allies, America might take over practically the entire control of the war. As a result of this incident Lord Cowdray, chairman of the Air Board, sent in his resignation to the premier.

IN Italy the retreat of the Italians ended, temporarily at least, at the Piave, and in place of mere delaying actions they began to meet attacks with counterattacks, to give way only step by step under great pressure and to hold ground in many places. The Teutons captured Belluno and Feltre on the west bank of the Piave flanking the Italian left wing. Simultaneously with this, another Austrian force drove south across the Sette Communi plateau, just west of the southern entrance of the Sugana valley, captured Asiago, as noted last week, and continued to drive southward, reached and captured Primolano, on the highroad from Feltre south to Bassano.

While this operation was taking place on the northern Italian wing a frontal attack was made on their southern wing near Dona di Piave, about ten miles from the sea. The Teutons crossed the river, where they maintained themselves against fierce Italian counter attacks; but were rendered comparatively harmless by the flooding of the captured area. Further crossings were attempted higher up the river at Fagare. Austro-German troops which crossed the river were counterattacked and driven back or captured.

Should it prove impossible for the Italians to retain their position on the Piave, a retreat to the Adige, the next defendable river to the west, seems inevitable. This would, of course, involve the abandonment of Venice.

Just Over the Fence

NEXT week isn't far away, but it's worth waiting for. Ever since the Star of Bethlehem and the angels directed seers and shepherds to the manger-throne children of God have been looking for the blessed age from which sin and evil should be absent. Next week Dr. Gray will tell us about "The Millennium, When, What and Where."

Dr. Jowett's December Sermon centers about the Kingdom of our Lord, declaring "He shall reign."

Russia is still in ferment. Another Williams' letter next week.

Last week Dr. Vail showed us the way around a headache. Next week he handles roughly our old enemy, rheumatism.

The Well in the Valley of Baca

*A THANKSGIVING SERMON BY REV. CHARLES CARROLL ALBERTSON, D.D.

TEXT—Ps. 84 : 6. "Who passing through the Valley of Baca make it a well."

"THE Valley of Baca" stands for an experience in life. The well in the Valley stands for a fact, by the help of which that experience may be more profitable and more pleasant than it seems. "The well in the Valley of Baca" is an Eastern metaphor designed to point out the possibility of peace in the midst of trouble; of comfort in distress; of satisfaction in desert places; of rest in the midst of tumult, and of thanksgiving in unlikely places and at unlikely times. "The well in the Valley of Baca" typifies the triumph of mind over matter, of spirit over force, of life over everything which seems unfriendly to it.

That prophet and poet of Israel had found the well in the Valley of Baca who wrote:

"Although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls: Yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation. The Lord God is my strength, and he will make my feet like hinds' feet, and he will make me to walk upon mine high places."

The two apostles had found it who, with bare and bleeding backs, their feet in stocks and their hands in chains, "at midnight prayed and sang praises unto God."

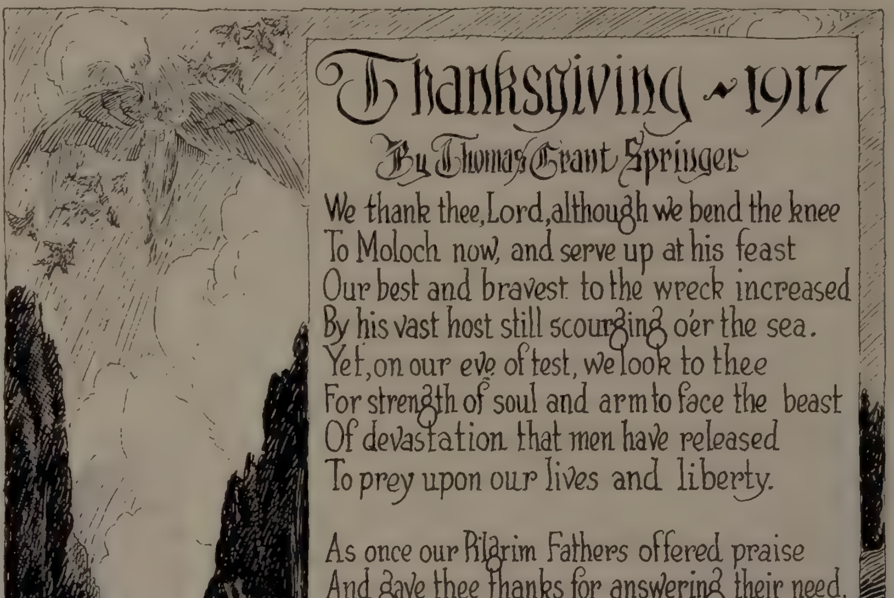
The Master had found it, this well, or it could not have been written that, with the shadows of the cross gathering fast around him, with all the world arrayed against him, deprived of all earthly support save that of the faltering friendship of a few panic-stricken disciples, he and they sang a hymn; nor could it have been written that, at their last frugal meal together, he "gave thanks."

WE use the wrong word if we say these prophets and apostles and their Master found the well in the Valley of Baca. They made it. "Who, passing through the Valley of Baca, make it a well." The well is of their own digging. They carry with them the faculty of opening wells in desert places. Nor is that faculty either physical or mental. Rather, it is moral. It is a heart faculty. "Blessed is the man in whose heart are the ways of them who, passing through the Valley of Baca, make it a well."

This psalm and this verse describe a pilgrim on his journey. Between the cradle and the grave, between his mother's arms and the arms of death, he passes over mountains and through valleys. He sings on the mountain-top. He prays and praises God in the valley. The well he makes is the well of gladness, of gratitude, of joy. If he finds a well no man could make, it is the well of salvation.

If we study the psalm in which the text occurs, we shall find that thanksgiving is the very keynote of it. Not less than the one hundred and third psalm does the eighty-fourth express the outgoing of a grateful heart to God for all His gifts, but chiefly for spiritual mercies. In the one hundred and third psalm, mention is made of the manifold gifts of God to the children of men. In the eighty-fourth the vision is narrowed; and by so much as the vision is narrowed, the feeling of the psalmist is intensified. The healing of our diseases and the filling of our mouths with good things are not to be compared in importance with the spiritual benefits by which we transform the valley of weeping into a place of praise. Of both these psalms redemption is the high note. And transformation is the fruit of redemption. "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree."

EVERY life has its Valley of Baca. Some lives seem to lie wholly there. Take the case of that child who, at a tender age, lost the senses of sight and hearing, and with the sense of hearing lost also the power of speech. From three and a half or four years of age to eight or nine, she lived in a world of darkness and silence. She was a moody, fitful child, hard to govern because she had so few points of contact with the world about her. Then there came a wise and skilful teacher, who unlocked the doors of the child's prison-house, and led her out into the world of knowledge. Only a few years ago this blind and deaf girl, no longer speechless, graduated from one of the first colleges in America. She has written several inspiring books, and wherever it is announced she is to speak, throngs of people are eager to hear her. Her life has all been lived in the Valley of Baca, but she made for herself a well, and it would be difficult to find a more serene and thankful spirit than that of Helen Keller. She has turned her handicap into capital. Her words of counsel to struggling youth are all the more weighty and precious, because she illustrates so perfectly the possible transformation of barrenness and dearth into fruitfulness and beauty. In her heart are the ways of them who, passing through the Valley of Baca, make it a well.



Thanksgiving ~ 1917

By Thomas Grant Springer

We thank thee, Lord, although we bend the knee
To Moloch now, and serve up at his feast
Our best and bravest to the wreck increased
By his vast host still scourging o'er the sea.
Yet, on our eve of test, we look to thee
For strength of soul and arm to face the beast
Of devastation that men have released
To prey upon our lives and liberty.

As once our Pilgrim Fathers offered praise
And gave thee thanks for answering their need,
So we, who yet may have the world to feed,
Look to thy bounty in these latter days.
In spite of those who mock thee with their boasts,
We thank thee, Lord of Harvests-and of Hosts!

There was that father of the Eastern Church whose motto was, "In everything give thanks." Chrysostom passed through the valley of violent persecution, resulting in the loss of worldly goods and favor; he passed through the valley of exile to a lonely death in an alien land. But he never passed through any valley in which that well, the well of gratitude, was not flowing. "Spoil me of my goods? That you can not do, for my treasure is in heaven! Banish me from home? That is impossible, for my citizenship is in heaven! Kill me? That is beyond your power, for my life is hid with Christ in God. May Jesus Christ be praised!"

SO here are two lives, one far from us in space and time, the other very close to us—for Miss Keller is now a near neighbor, living at Forest Hills, Long Island—but the valley through which they passed is the same valley, the well from which they drank is the same well, and "the rain that filleth the pools" is the same of which the psalmist wrote a thousand years before the opening of the fountain in the house of David.

Once a year, the President appoints a Thanksgiving Day, but God appoints thanksgiving every day, and it is only as we make thanksgiving a daily habit that we can know the meaning of a phrase sanctified by countless generations of saints, "the blessing of a thankful heart."

The world is passing through the Valley of Baca in these days. No sun-smitten valley of old Palestine, strewn with the bones of men and beasts that perished there because of lack of food or water, could ever have presented such a spectacle of ruin as large sections of Europe at the present time. A newspaper correspondent on the western front attempted to describe the devastation of a recently evacuated zone in France. Words failed him. He said he could imagine nothing like it unless it might be "the infernal regions on house-cleaning day." Stately mansions and modest cottages alike are mere heaps of rubbish. Beautiful churches are masses of calcined stone. High explosive shells have shattered all the forest trees. Orchards and vineyards have disappeared. It was said of the Shenandoah Valley after a raid during the Civil War that even a crow flying over that region would have to take his rations with him. But compared with certain sections of war-torn Europe today, the Shenandoah Valley was a paradise. The flower of the young manhood of a dozen nations has perished since August, 1914. Ten million homes are in mourning. The streets of European cities are crowded with crippled soldiers. Multitudes have lost the kindly light of reason. The heavens seem black with the wreckage of once happy homes. The world is a Valley of Weeping! But is there no redeeming well? Are all our songs in minor strains? Is there no place in all this valley where we can uplift a Te Deum Laudamus? Have we no heart for Thanksgiving this November? Ah, they are blind who fail to see that there are wells of blessings in this terrible valley! The world has never before had such clear vision of eternal values. Never before have we held mere material possessions so lightly. From the rubbish heap of civilization, the jewel of character shines out with undimmed splendor. A French mother wrote to her son in Canada: "Your two brothers have fallen in battle. Come home as soon as possible to help defend France." Was motherhood, Spartan, Roman, or Christian, ever finer than that? Harry Lauder's only son fell in battle. The father went to France to sing for the soldiers there, and to find the shallow grave where his comrades had laid away the body of the boy. He found the grave, and standing there, he said: "I would like to see my boy for just a minute or two. I would like to tell him how proud I am of him and how thankful I am for what he has done for the world." Was fatherhood ever nobler than that? From the trenches a soldier wrote his mother: "There are few comforts here, but I would rather be here than anywhere else in the world. This if Liberty's farthest outpost. I never was so sure of God and of myself as I am today." Was manhood ever more admirable?

AMERICA is not yet in the Valley of Baca, but we are at the edge of the Valley. By the grace of God we shall make it a well! Sergeant Arthur Guy Empey, author of "Over the Top," said to me last Thursday night, "I wish you knew how all the men in the army feel about the chaplains who go into the trenches unarmed, the bravest of the brave." All the chaplains and all the Y. M. C. A. men testify that though the soldiers have no use for the mere forms of religion, men were never so eager in their response to a manly presentation of the essential elements of a spiritual religion. A few hours ago I heard Chaplain Victor Monod of the French army say, "Protestants and Catholics alike among the soldiers hear our message gladly. I said to one, a Catholic, as he entered a front line trench, 'God be with you—you need him,' and he answered, 'I thank you; I know I need God.'" Such a man is a seeker after God, and God is not very far from all such souls. God is the well in their Valley of Baca.

And God is the deepest well and the sweetest well in every Valley of Baca. The rain of his grace filleth the pools. By the help of the refreshment he bestows, every one of us may pursue his journey unfainting to the mount of God. By that help we go from strength to strength, lifting our hearts every step of the way in such a song as this, "Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

A Quenchless Fire

SUNDAY, December 2. Ps. 7 : 11, R. V. "A God that hath indignation every day." Our sacred fire does not burn every day. It burns only intermittently. It has occasional flares when it leaps up with fierce intensity, but it soon dies down, and smolders, or goes quite out. It is like a bonfire of tarred wood; it has a spasm of fervency, but no steady and continual glow. When the revelation of some moral outrage first appears we burn with hot antagonism. But if the outrage continues, and we become accustomed to its presence, our healthy indignation begins to subside. Our very familiarity with an evil is apt to damp our fires. The very evil which kindles our anger smothers it by its continuance.

All of which means that there comes a stage where our holiness ceases to be shocked at the presence of the unholy. Our holiness is not healthy enough, and therefore not sensitive enough, to retain its power of repulsion. It does not possess a glorious sense of offense. It is not strong enough to maintain its distance. What it first loathed it now tolerates, and it is almost inevitable that when we tolerate a wrong we begin to fraternize with it. In this realm the absence of antagonism means the birth of fellowship. Friendly messages pass between the trenches, and we begin to cherish what we were intended to destroy. Our very presence, which should have consumed the evil, quickens it, just as a congenial climate fosters some deadly plague.

Now God's holiness is altogether different. His indignation never burns low in the presence of wrong. When iniquity raises its head his light is always lightning. "Out of the throne proceeded lightning!" God's holiness never tolerates sin. His holiness never becomes so lukewarm as to be amiable to seemingly small revolts. "Whosoever shall break one of the least of these commandments!" It is jealous for fidelity in small affairs. It is angry with the infidelity that shows its face in the apparent trifle. And why? Because the spirit of outrageous sin can enter the sacred circle through a neglected scruple. The burglar can get into the house through a little unfastened window in the scullery. Smallpox may be spread by a cent as well as by a thousand-dollar bill. And it is little use working up indignation against mighty epidemics if we are coldly negligent about the single germs. But this also is one of our dangers. Our fires blaze in crises, but they do not burn against the smaller things which make them. Our indignation does not burn every day either against great wrongs which have become familiar, or against the lesser wrongs which are the breeding beds of more sensational sins. "God hath indignation every day!" In the presence of wrong God is always aflame. "Our God is a consuming fire." He will not parley with sin, but he will burn it in unquenchable fire. J. H. J.

The Cost of Growth

MONDAY, December 3. Matt. 6 : 28. "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow." The history of every Christian, and indeed of every moral man, shows constant endeavor to grow in moral and spiritual stature and strength. The early maxims of Benjamin Franklin (from some of which he sadly departed in later life) and the "Journal" of Amiel, far apart as they are in literary style, are in perfect agreement in this; that both men were exceedingly anxious to increase in moral stature. Jesus was anxious that his disciples should grow, even as he had grown, in wisdom, and in favor with God and man. The record reveals that they did grow. It is easy to see how Paul grew, for instance, in humility. At first he calls himself an apostle, and is proud of the title. Later he calls himself less than the least of all the apostles. Later still he refers to himself as the chief of sinners.

How can we grow in the likeness of our Lord? Exactly as lilies grow, by fulfilling the conditions of growth. Flowers, however, have no consciousness, and can not cooperate with Nature in their growth. We have the capacity to cooperate with God in securing our own spiritual maturity. How did Jesus grow in grace? By obedience at home, by public confession of his faith, and by public acceptance of his office, by steadfast resistance to evil, by daily observance of the law of service, and by patient submission to suffering. How did Paul grow? By contemplation. He it is who gives us the formula, "We all, with open face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed." There is an Eastern proverb, "Look at Buddha and you become like Buddha." The Arabs have a saying, "The barren fig tree looks upon the fruitful fig tree and becomes fruitful." Paul's frequent use of the phrase, "with Christ," indicates how he grew by association. A much more significant phrase often on his lips is "in Christ." So that it is evident he grew by appropriation, rather than by imitation. Buddhism cherishes the hope of the ultimate absorption of the human into the divine. Beholding Jesus, companioning with Jesus, abiding in Jesus, we too are absorbed in the divine, incorporated with the divine, yet not so as to impair our individuality or abate our identity. "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live." C. C. A.

The Unspeakable Gift

TUESDAY, December 4. II Cor. 9 : 15. "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." Every careful reader of II Cor. 9 has been struck with the sudden exclamation with which the apostle closes this chapter. All have felt that the collection which the Christians in Achaia had raised for the saints at Jerusalem cannot be the "unspeakable gift" to which the apostle refers. It is inconceivable that the apostle would speak in such exaggerated terms of a common charity. The charities which Christians bestow rather remind the apostle of the great charity which they have received.

God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. That is the unspeakable gift which the apostle has in mind as he contemplates the love-gifts of Christians to one another. It is the great Christmas Gift which the Father in heaven has laid in the lap of the world, which enriches beggar and prince, sire and son, the wise and the simple alike.

Is not this abundant reason to raise heart and voice to God in gratitude and exclaim: "Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift"? Angels sang "Glory to God!" as they bent adoring over the mystery of godliness: God manifest in the flesh. Let us, who are the real beneficiaries of this wonderful event, break forth in fervent thanks, and bless the Father who sent us this greatest of all Christmas gifts. W. H. T. D.

The Call to God

WEDNESDAY, December 5. Num. 10 : 29. "Come with us and we will do thee good." Moses appeals to Hobab, his father-in-law, urging him to journey with them to the promised land of Canaan; but Hobab, being contented with his own home land and people, was willing to let well enough alone, having no aspirations after higher and better things. He was not inclined to make sacrifices, either for his own good or for the benefit of others. It was then that Moses made a second appeal, saying, "If you will not go with us for your personal good, think how much we need a man like you, acquainted with the wilderness life and the tribes therein. Come, therefore, for the sake of Israel, that you may be eyes to us in the desert, helping to guide us to the hoped-for land of Canaan." Hobab, touched by this appeal, responded favorably and thus gained good for himself by being willing to help do good for others.

Should not every one feel that God's call means first self-surrender and second self-sacrifice for others? First, be in Christ a new creature, and second, be with him working to rescue all the world. Should we not seek salvation for our own sake, that we may become fitted to work for Jesus' sake and for the sake of humanity? E. W. C.

The Parable of the Eurglar

THURSDAY, December 6. Matt. 24 : 43. "If the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up." The world has changed since Jesus' day, but the habits of thieves have not changed. They never publish their proposed itineraries. They do not notify their victims of the hour of their intended arrival. Our Lord's words are a plea for personal preparedness. A child can see the significance of this parable. Yet it has special applications which children may not see; which only a careful study of the Scriptures and a thorough knowledge of life enable us to draw. We believe Jesus was speaking primarily of the speedily approaching destruction of Jerusalem. He had, however, a far perspective, and looked forward through the centuries to a time when, the Gospel having been preached to all the nations, the Son of Man shall come the second time without sin unto salvation.

There is another coming of the Son of Man for which the text warns us to prepare. The hour of our passing from earth is in a very real sense to each of us the coming of the Lord. It is his coming for judgment and reward. It is his coming in the sense in which a master comes to call his servants to account, to requite the faithful and to punish the recreant. The second coming of the Son of Man may be far away in the centuries to come, but the coming of the Lord at the end of our days, in the nature of the case cannot be far away. "Time hurries past us like the wind, and swift the moments fly." We should not think much of death or give much time to meditation among the tombs. A thousand duties call us into the thick of life's battles. But in and through them all, there may be heard the still small voice which says, "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong." C. C. A.

The Light of the World

FRIDAY, December 7. Luke 2 : 29-32. "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel." Aged Simeon with the Christ Child in his arms and bidding the world a glad farewell is one of the most affecting scenes in the Christmas story. The infant in his arms is to him a token of peace and a seal attesting the truthfulness of God's promises. He is not afraid to die, for he has a good conscience now this child is come to take away the sins of the world. He has no misgivings about his fate beyond; for God, who has kept his word to him here, will also keep it hereafter. His dim eyes rest with intense love and gratitude upon his salvation, and the sight causes his trembling lips to frame a sweet melody—his swan-song.

But while appropriating the child and all the blessed fruits of his coming to himself personally, he holds him up to all the world as the universal Saviour. He is a Jewish child, the noblest scion of God's ancient covenant people, their greatest glory among the nations of the earth; for of no other nation can it be said: Out of Judah did our Lord come, and salvation is of the Jews. But he is at the same time the guerdon of the Gentiles' yearning. Already the star that is rising over his manger is leading Gentile travelers from distant lands to him. In him all mankind finds its rallying center: he is heaven's answer to the prayers which burdened hearts in all zones and climes and in all ages have lifted up to God for pardon and peace. He is the world's cheer in all its worry, toil and misery. He is the incentive to every truly good endeavor and the never disappointing promise to every righteous and noble aspiration. In him the fears of all men are quieted and their hopes stilled.

O Christ, be thou my Lord, and let me be thy servant. Let me live out my span of life in thy service, and with thee in my heart let me start upon my last pilgrimage, to go home to the Father and to thee! W. H. T. D.

Looking Unto Him

SATURDAY, December 8. Isa. 45 : 22. "Look unto me and be ye saved." Bishop Fowler says that George Whitefield once tried to lead to Christ a poor Scottish peasant woman. She seemed unable to grasp the idea of faith. One day Whitefield heard a woman saying to her sick child, "Lippen to me, lippen to me," and the little one nestled closer in her arms. The evangelist hurried away to the one who could not believe and exclaimed to her, "Lippen to Jesus, lippen to Jesus." She bowed her head with tears streaming down her cheeks as she cried, "Is that all, is that all?" The seeker had thus found the Saviour by looking unto him in an attitude of faith. Looking is believing; it is next to loving. Looking was living to the dying Israelites as they gazed at the brazen serpent. So there is life for a look at the Crucified One. Every sinful, troubled soul should inquire, "Sirs, we would see Jesus," and as you gaze, your next words will be, "Thou art near, O Lord; now mine eyes see thee, the One altogether lovely." Beholding him, we become radiant and shine as lights to men.

Dr. Trimble as a boy saw Adoniram Judson get off a train, and he said, "I never saw such light on a human face before." He took knowledge that Judson had been with Jesus. That look upon the face of a holy man was never forgotten by the great Sunday school worker.

One day a judge of the Supreme Court saw in a lawyer's office Hoffman's painting of the boy Jesus talking with the doctors in the temple. When his errand was finished, he turned to the picture again, gazing upon it with great interest. The next morning he came on purpose to take a look at that Boy. For an hour he studied the wonderful face. The day after, he took the picture into the private inner office, and when he came out the tears were streaming down his face as he said, "That Boy has conquered me"; and the judge went out to tell how a look at Christ had transformed his life. Thanksgiving

THE recurrence of the old New England festival of Thanksgiving, long since made national, finds the people of the United States in a mood to give thanks to the Guiding Power with a new sense of their responsibilities and a new view of their blessings.

If we have not all we should like to have to be thankful for, all that we felt only a few months ago that we were justified in expecting, we have so much more than many of our contemporaries, and what we have is so substantial, that we must feel the spirit of the festival as strongly and fervently as did the colonists of Massachusetts Bay. They dwelt always in the midst of alarms, their existence was always full of vicissitudes, but they were gratefully aware of their freedom from many perils of body and soul, of the promise of development held out to them, and of their sure escape from the evils that beset them in the Old World. So we, in our turn, may be sincerely grateful, and in a larger sense, for what we have and what we have escaped.

We are only beginning to share in the terrible affliction that now burdens Europe. The loss upon us is not small, but in comparison with that our brothers in France, Belgium, Russia, England, Germany, Austria, Italy and other states must bear it is insignificant. We have had a year of good crops, enabling us to keep ourselves and help to feed the hungry beyond our shores.

In spite of the derangements, the losses and the horrors of war and the enforced self-denial and suffering, the people of this country have a Thanksgiving Day in which our thanks for deliverance from encompassing evils and for promise of blessings to come may be expressed with gratitude and heartiness.

The Suffrage Advance

THE advances made by woman suffrage, notably in the carrying of New York State by a large majority, will have a tremendous influence for the cause in every part of the nation. It is bound to have a powerful effect upon Congress; and the Federal Amendment granting the ballot to the women of America and taking the suffrage question out of state politics has been brought materially nearer.

The splendid campaign the women have conducted has been a clean, vigorous, insistent appeal to intelligence and sense of justice. Suffering and sacrifice have been undergone without complaining; ridicule, abuse and injustice have been borne bravely; high principles and purposes have been persistently adhered to, in spite of all.

The change of more than a quarter million votes in New York State alone, within two years, is convincing indication of the effectiveness of the women's campaign and of the decided shift of public feeling on this question.

Pity the Poor Rich!

"MILLIONAIRES who laugh are rare," says Andrew Carnegie.

Let us pause and shed a tear for the poor rich!

They have been shamefully neglected and left to suffer alone and without sympathy.

Through social settlement work we are doing much to make people happy, though poor. Ought not something be done for the neglected rich?

Possibly if we could evolve a social system that would teach the rich how to find happiness in using their money properly, the poverty problem would speedily solve itself.

Few have not felt that if they were only wealthy they would have much more time for enjoyment and that their lives would be immeasurably more happy.

But is this a fair conclusion? Common as it is, all evidence is against it.

We know that it is the resolves, the efforts, the triumphs in the accumulation of wealth, not the mere possession of it, which give the keener gratification.

Do we not see the brighter, happier faces among the humbler folk?

Does not the laugh ring out more merrily and more true from the cottages than from the mansions?

We can't all be rich, and it is far better that we can't. If we could, it would be a dull, sad world.

If there were none poor, none struggling, none aspiring after essential things, there would be no genuine happiness for the rich to try to imitate.

The world would soon forget how to laugh.

Prayer and the World's Troubles

JOHN R. MOTT, America's greatest layman, is a strong believer in the prevailing power of prayer. He has put this belief into the compact form of a declaratory statement which merits the serious attention of all Christians at the present time. He suggests a united search for discovery of the resources and the guidance of God, who has promised to show "the great things and the difficult" to those who call upon him. He would apply this to the great war and its problems, which man, in his own strength and wisdom, cannot satisfactorily solve.

"Those who spend enough time in actual communion with God to become really conscious of their absolute dependence on him, shall change the mere energy of the flesh for the power of God," he writes. "There is no danger that men will spend too much time alone with God. When a man says that he obtains more help from social than from secret prayer, he is in spiritual peril. Each person should have regular, stated seasons for private prayer. Each one must decide for himself the number and the distribution of the times he will give to these spiritual exercises. It is indeed true that 'he that saveth his time from prayer shall lose it. And he that loseth his time for communion with God shall find it again, in added blessing and power and fruitfulness.' We are in the greatest need of help in what I believe in my inmost soul is the most important thing, next to prayer itself, that we ever have to do, and that is the enlisting of men in the exercise of real prayer. In some way we must get men and women who actually believe in the mountain-moving power of prayer to devote themselves to special intercession. Whatever can be done, therefore, to help to enlist even a few men and women who will, with sincerity and earnestness, join us in intercession, will prove, with God's assured blessing, to be the greatest single service any of us can render."

This timely message from a large-hearted Christian citizen should awaken new courage and kindle new consecration among praying men and women throughout our land. A nation at public prayer is a gracious and beautiful thing; but the hearts and lips of God's people sending up their appeal in united intercession, though far apart from each other, illlustrates the faith that can move Omnipotence to do wondrous things for a world that has gone far astray for the lack of faith in God and his leadership, and which is overcome with troubles as the result. God in his wisdom knows the solution. Let all pray to him that he may apply it, and that his will may be done on earth as in heaven.

Help for the Helpless

AS the Christian Herald asked its readers, in the name of the suffering Armenians and Syrians and the unfortunate people of Palestine, for funds for their relief, in their name it now expresses gratitude and thanks for the generous responses of its readers. Recent contributions, amounting to $25,000, have just been transferred to the American Committee.

A heart-appealing cause has been brought into touch with true hearts that thrill with sympathy and eagerness to help.

The Christian Herald is glad to be the channel of an appeal so worthy and of a response so prompt and noble.

In our Thanksgiving, let us remember those of our blessings sweetest of all in the sight of the Father—the inclination as well as the means to help the helpless.

The Marriage Contract

AN Iowa couple, each of whom had been married twice before and twice divorced, have sought to insure the success of their third venture by a detailed written contract. It is surely one of the most extraordinary prenuptial agreements ever made. Remembering the rocks upon which their various matrimonial ships have been wrecked before, they have carefully charted them and mapped out the courses around them. The contract specifically sets forth which one shall build the fires, when the husband may bring guests home to meals, when the relatives of each shall visit them, how the spending of money is to be divided, how often the wife may attend clubs and social functions.

Thus they have arranged, they think, for every possible contingency that may arise in the wedded life of two persons.

Maybe they will find it so. But it takes no pessimistic spirit to suspect that such a contract contains either too much or too little.

The possible troubles of a married couple may be provided against by contract. But it must be a contract not of paper and writing, but of the heart and the temperament.

If the hearts be right, all the possible troubles of the pair may be summed up in a few words. But if these be not right, no possible combination of all the words in the dictionary can even indicate the possible troubles.

The marriage contract that means the most needs say the least. "To love and cherish one another"—here is a contract that covers more ground than can definitely be expressed in all the words in the language.

If that will not hold good under all conditions and in all contingencies, no other contract will.

Our Supplement

EVERY reader of the Christian Herald will be interested in the Premium Supplement and Prospectus which form a part of this issue. These are the result of many weeks and months of loving preparation, in which our whole thought has been to bring to the great Christian Herald Family not only new and welcome sources of instruction, enjoyment and recreation for every home in which it is now read, but to bind them still closer together in the ties of spiritual friendship and mutual helpfulness during the coming year.

In this labor of love—for such it has been on our part—we have succeeded in some things beyond our expectations. Never have we been able to present a line of books so attractive as those which the Supplement describes. Dr. Iglehart's splendid volume will doubtless command wide attention as it deserves. Rodeheaver's book of true tales of the songs that have won souls has all the vivid interest of living drama. And the housewives, who are often sorely troubled in these days of enforced economy, will find a real and very practical helper in "Uncle Sam's Advice to Housewives." There are many other books in the Supplement, from which there should be little difficulty in making a choice.

In regard to religious features, our readers will find that there is assurance of an abundance of good things for 1918, and that our contributing staff of the best-known and soundest pastors of all the leading denominations—reinforced by the addition of new names—will give comfort and encouragement through their helpful and inspiring ministry during the coming year.

Every Christian is or should be a student of Prophecy in this time of world crises. Therefore our readers will welcome the announcement that the Prophetic Series begun by Dr. Gray, and which is proving a treasury of interpretative scholarship to every Bible-lover, will be continued, and that other able writers on the same subject will follow him.

In the literary field, too, many fine features are announced. Dr. Sheldon's new serial, "Howard Chase," which begins shortly, is one of the best he has ever written, and will be thoroughly enjoyed by our readers.

Then there are the Magazine Combinations, an abundance of them, giving a choice wide enough for all tastes, at prices low enough to suit any pocket.

But we need not recapitulate here all the points of interest in the Supplement. Read it carefully and pass it around among your acquaintances. And when you have read and made your choice, send in your order with your renewal early. We ask this as a personal favor, for it is a material help to us and greatly lightens the burden of our work, which is usually a very heavy one a few weeks later, when renewals come in like a torrent, and our counting-room staff is hard taxed to handle them promptly. You will be helping us and yourself by forwarding your subscription NOW, instead of a few weeks hence. And if you can send in with it One New Subscriber, you will be doing good missionary work in extending the influence of your favorite home journal.

Most people expect too much from God for the little investment they make.

All preaching is not Gospel preaching. Where that is scarce converts are scarce.

The man who plans to sin and doesn't still needs God's forgiveness for the sin of planning.

There are more ways than one to get a man into the Kingdom, and more ways than one to keep him there. Any way that turns the trick is right.

Methodist Banner Missionary Year

THE Christians of the nation and the world will join in the thanksgiving of the Methodist Episcopal Church at the record missionary report of that church for the past year at the meeting of the Board of Missions in New York City, November 9. Dr. George M. Fowles, treasurer of the board, announced that the total receipts for the year were $1,940,304, and in addition $143,074 had been added to the permanent fund. The meeting was marked by the presence of many missionaries from foreign lands. The satisfaction at the large total contributed through the board was enhanced when it was announced that the total received for work in foreign fields reached, when the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society and the Board of Sunday Schools added their collections, the sum of $3,146,062. One of the principal tasks before the board is the maturing of plans for its centenary, which the World Program Committee at the recent Niagara Falls Convention recommended should be held beginning January 1 next, and which will have as its principal object the raising of $8,000,000 a year for five years to finance an enlarged mission program throughout the world. The missionaries were told that revolution in China has led to wonderful mental awakening, with a resultant turning away from old religions and a marked leaning toward Christianity. The church has 25,000 students there. Joined with the congratulations for past successes will be the general hope that the plan to raise the many millions annually to meet the wide demands of the work in foreign fields may meet with success, and that all the denominations in the country may be blessed in their aggressive missionary plans, and that this prayer of our Lord may be answered: "Thy Kingdom come, thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." (Matt. 6 : 10.)

World's Sunday School Association

THE World's Sunday School Association held its annual meeting in the city of New York recently, with Mr. H. J. Heinz as its chairman. Mr. Frank L. Brown, the secretary of the Association, made a detailed report of the meeting and the Association's activities, from which we quote the following: "There are 350,000 of these Sunday schools scattered all over the world, 3,500,000 instructors, and 35,000,000 units. On the table in the committee room in the Metropolitan Tower was a bullet-pierced French Testament. It was worn over the heart of a French soldier, Eugene Sarrail, and in the battle at Altkirch had saved his life, for the bullet on its rebound stopped on the farther side of the Testament. This book was one of 1,300,000 Testaments and Gospels sent to Europe by American Sunday school scholars. Action was taken at the gathering calling upon the Sunday schools in Japan, Korea, China, Philippines, Africa, South America and other foreign fields, as well as the Sunday schools of the United States, to make an offering at Christmas time for the 400,000 suffering children of Armenia and Syria.

Then Mr. J. G. Holdcroft, the World's Sunday School representative in Korea, told of the 200,000 in the Sunday schools of the Land of the Morning Calm, where the Christians are but one generation old; of the 203 ordained preachers and 1,100 other helpers. Bishop Hartzell, who founded Methodist missions in North Africa, spoke of the splendid progress of Sunday school work among the Moslems; of the Arabic Sunday school literature; of the week-day and Sunday schools in Algiers, Constantine, Tunis, and Fort National, with 350 Moslem boys in five schools; of the new Arabic hymn-book of sixty-seven songs; of a $50,000 rubber plantation, the income of which was left for Christian work among Moslems; of the new government schools recently established by the British government in Sierra Leone among 250,000 pagan and Moslem children. Then came reports of Sunday school progress in South America, Japan, the Philippines and China, of a million new members added annually to the roster of the World's Sunday School army. And last came the appointment of a new World's Sunday School Commission to present a world message and a world program for a great Sunday school advance in each country following the war, for the Sunday school is the short cut to the world's saving and reconstruction. But this saving means serving. The new day and this generation must be trained in the Sunday school for service. The marvelous success of the World's Sunday School Association is worthy of a world's thanksgiving. The Jew was thus required to give religious instruction to the children: "And ye shall teach them to your children." (Deut. 11 : 19.)

The Peach King Dead

JOHN HOWARD HALE, known as the "Peach King," and recognized as an expert horticulturist, died at his home in Glastonbury, Conn., October 13. Starting as a farm hand at a salary of $14 a month, he soon learned to raise peaches, and with their product he bought back the old homestead, which had gotten out of the hands of his family, and added enough to it to make a peach orchard of 500 acres. As a self-taught scientific farmer Mr. Hale several years ago saw the possibilities of peach-growing in Georgia, and was instrumental in organizing what is said to be the largest peach orchard in the world, having 2,160 acres near Macon planted with 350,000 trees of selected varieties. Mr. Hale was a prolific writer on fruit-growing and general farming, and for fifteen years was agricultural editor of the Hartford Courant and twelve years associate editor of the Farm Journal of Philadelphia. In Bible lands they had delicious fruits of many varieties, which are thus mentioned: "Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath, and for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun." (Deut. 33 : 13-14.)

Icelanders Want a Flag

THE people and parliament of Iceland are demanding a flag of their own and more independence, although the island possesses extended home rule. The demand for democracy is so intense and world-wide that the people are calling for a flag of their own, and the local press of Iceland asserts that if the demand for a national emblem is not met, they are liable to declare their independence of the mother country. The new flag demanded would stand for popular education, for free government, for prohibition, and for an earnest evangelical Christianity. The nations of old had their flags. There is this reference to them: "In the name of our God we will set up our banners." (Ps. 20 : 5.)

Queen Liliuokalani Dead

QUEEN LILIUOKALANI of Hawaii died in Honolulu November 11. She was born in 1838 and ascended the throne in 1891, succeeding King Kalakaua, her brother. In 1862 she married John O. Dominis, an American. Soon after her installation as sovereign she faced a revolution and a demand for a new constitution, which she was forced to sign. In 1893, with the help of influential leaders, she undertook to get a new constitution restoring the powers taken from the throne. A committee of public safety was formed and the queen was deposed. A commission was sent to the United States asking for annexation. A protectorate over the Islands was established under President Harrison, which was removed by President Cleveland. In the meantime a conspiracy was formed to overthrow the provisional government and restore the queen. She was convicted of high treason and sentenced to prison for five years, which was not enforced. On July 4, 1894, a republic was proclaimed with Sanford B. Dole as president, and four years later, annexation to the United States followed. The Hawaiian Legislature voted the deposed queen a pension of $4,000 a year, and the income of a sugar plantation of 6,000 acres. She fought hard for reinstatement, and for 1,000,000 acres of crown land the republic had seized. She was a talented woman, spoke good English, wrote "Hawaii's Story," and at least 100 Hawaiian hymns. She, like other monarchs, had to step down and out to make room for the democracy that is and is to be. There is this account of the deposition of a queen, not by the people, but by her son: "He removed her from being queen because she had made an idol in a grove." (II Chron. 15: 16.)

Bees as Food Conservers

BEES, nature's sugar manufacturers, are called upon to serve the country now in its need for sweets as an article of food. The Department of Agriculture has just issued a loud call for a large number of persons to take up bee culture as an occupation to help out in the food emergency of the world. Hives can be established in waste places, and the most delicious sweets produced without the need of an acre of ground, a plow or hoe, or cane or beet seed. The working bees go out into the gardens and orchards and sip nectar from the beautiful blossoms, put it in their honey sacks, carry it home, and by chemical process unknown to man, transmute it into honey. Men try to help them with substitutes for their nectar, or by providing wax, but the bees resent the proposition as an impertinence and say frankly they do not want human help in their factory. In the present international and world wide threat of a sugar famine, a sweet so delicious and so economically manufactured as honey should help amazingly in the settlement of this feature of the food problem. It will be well on Thanksgiving Day to be grateful to the God of nature, who puts nectar in the garden and orchard blooms, and then causes the bees to turn the nectar into honey to provide such delicious food for man. The bees of Bible times were more economical than those of today. They did not tax man with the expense of the hive, but used the hollow trees that God provided. In those times men counted honey as a most desirable article of food. The promised land to the Israelites was "a land that floweth with milk and honey." (Joshua 5 : 6.)

THE PARK

A Thanksgiving Story

By Margaret E. Sangster

"YOU'LL like the apartment," Boy had written. "It will seem small, of course, and crowded; but there's a jolly little park in front of it—a friendly little park that will make it seem more like home."

It had been early spring, then. And Marcia Allen had stored her furniture and had sold the house in the country, and had come East to the Big City to make pleasant the apartment for Boy—Boy of the laughing eyes and the smiling lips. Because Boy was just making good, and he needed a home and home cooking and a mother.

It had been early spring, then. And the little park had been friendly. She and Boy, together, had found crocuses and lilacs blooming in the far corners of it; had seen a single unexpected dogwood-tree burst into rosy-edged blossoms. They had watched young mothers sit in the sun with tiny shawl-wrapped babies hugged tight to their breasts—they had tried not to watch the young lovers who walked, silently and close together, through the late dusk.

PERHAPS she was seeing the park differently because she was lonely. For Marcia Allen was lonely. She no longer sang at her work, and she watched from her window with a strange numb feeling as the leaves drifted from the withered trees. The little apartment, which had seemed so very small after the roomy country home, was pitifully large since Boy had gone away, brave in his olive drab. Dinner-time had always held the joy of reunion for Marcia Allen—it had meant a scurry of feet on the stairs, a key in the lock, a shout of "O mother!" in the hall. Now dinner-time was only a grim setting of the table, a careful washing of china, afterward, in the steaming dish-pan. Everything was like that.

Marcia Allen turned her gaze away from the park and looked long and unsmiling into the pictured eyes of Boy—the pictured eyes that looked at her from the silver frame on the wall.

"Sonny," she said at last, and aloud, "I'm not fit to be the mother of a soldier. I'm not. And yet, with tomorrow Thanksgiving, and you in France . . . " Marcia Allen's gray head bowed itself suddenly on the window-sill, Marcia Allen's dry sobs crept heart-breakingly through the room. "Thanksgiving!" she murmured. "And you—in France!"

Outside a hurdy-gurdy began to play a wheezy version of the Marseillaise. The music, robbed of its beauty, still held the power and the rhythm that could call men forth to fight. "A brave song," Boy had once whispered softly: "a brave song . . . "

Bravely the gray head raised itself. Bravely the eyes of Marcia Allen looked out again into the park. It was strangely empty, for the night was near—strangely empty save for a tired figure that sat on a bench—a figure that seemed to huddle itself together away from the wrath of the wind.

"Why," said Marcia Allen, "it's an old woman. Older than me—" she amended.

The Marseillaise throbbed chokily on. And all at once the woman on the bench buried her face in her two hands. The woman watching from the window felt a sudden lump rise in her throat.

"Perhaps her son has gone, too!" said Marcia Allen.

IN the Middle Western village where the home had been, folk were neighborly and sympathetic. In the Big City it was different. But the park had always been friendly to her, and somehow the dim figure on the bench seemed a part of the park. Marcia Allen, quite on impulse, caught a cape from the rack in the little hall, hurried breathlessly down the stairs and across the street. The figure on the bench did not move at her approach—but Marcia Allen heard sobs as gaspingly dry as her own had been. Her hand rested gently on one shaking arm.

"Please," she said, and her voice was big with understanding, "please don't take on so."

The woman on the bench raised tired eyes. But Marcia Allen, quick to notice details, saw that the sleeve that she had touched was made of fine material, that the hat on the fluffy white hair was not a cheap hat.

"Who—who are you?" questioned the woman on the bench.

"I was looking out of my window," said Marcia Allen a bit awkwardly, "and I saw you crying here. I—I'd been crying myself. I wondered if you'd maybe come in and have a cup of tea with me. And perhaps—" she paused.

The little lady on the bench straightened up. "So kind of you—" she began in a shakily formal voice, and then quite suddenly a something in Marcia Allen's eyes found a something in her own and clung there. "I'd be delighted," she finished with a smile that was just a bit quivery.

THEY went across the street and up the stairs together, Marcia Allen and the stranger. In the living-room of the little apartment Marcia Allen lit a match and touched it gingerly to the yellow candles that Boy had so loved. The light of them flickered like a benediction across the silver frame on the wall. The stranger woman followed the flicker with her eyes.

"Your son?" she questioned softly.

"That's Boy!" Marcia Allen told her proudly. "My only—Boy. He's—he's Over There! That's why," she finished softly, "I was crying."

The stranger woman was looking at the picture of Boy as if she saw visions.

"I had a son once," she told Marcia Allen. "He left us when he was very—small. . . . And then my husband . . . "

"You?" Marcia Allen looked her sympathy.

"I'm all alone, now," the stranger woman told her; "all alone."

"Then," said Marcia Allen suddenly, and all the horror of a war, all the fears of every mother sounded in her voice, "then you're lucky. For you haven't anybody that you've got to give—you haven't any son you've got to send away to fight."

"I haven't!" echoed the stranger woman.

"He was my baby," Marcia Allen told her. "My own very little baby! I knitted his tiny booties for him, just as now I'm making gray wool into sleeveless sweaters and fingerless mittens. I held him in my arms, and sang to him, and rocked him to sleep. He was my baby . . . "

The stranger woman was staring at the photograph with a veiled mistiness in her eyes. After a moment Marcia Allen went on.

"When he was a small boy," she said, "I kissed his stone-bruises to make them well. There were black eyes, too, sometimes. . . . And then when he was older and we were alone I worked for him so that he might go to college—might have his dream of a career. And when he came to the city to find his work and sent for me I sold the old home and came here to him . . . "

SOMEWHERE, very much farther away, the hurdy-gurdy sounded again. Distance softened the blatantly hard notes, toned the discords into vaguely minor phrases. And it was still playing the Marseillaise.

"He marched away," said Marcia Allen. Her voice was very hard. "He marched away, down Fifth Avenue. I saw him, there by the Arch, in his khaki suit. It was summer and warm, but he looked so cool, and fresh, and young. And I wanted to cry."

"But," quite softly the stranger woman interrupted, "but you didn't!"

"I didn't!" said Marcia Allen fiercely. "But it seemed as if my whole world was going around, and upside down. It seemed as if my whole life had been torn up by the roots andthrown away, on a brush-pile, to die. It seemed as if there was nothing left. Nothing! He was my baby, and he's gone!"

"You've got," the stranger woman pointed to the photograph in the silver frame, "that!"

"Tomorrow," said Marcia Allen, unheedingly, "will be Thanksgiving Day. And I will be alone. And he may be—" she choked. "What," she finished, "have I got to be thankful for?"

The stranger woman raised her face until the candlelight fell full upon it. She spoke.

"I, too," she said, "will spend Thanksgiving alone tomorrow. Not in a place like this," the slight sweep of her arm took in the little apartment, "not in a place like this, a place touched with love and remembrance . . . "

Marcia Allen followed the gaze of the stranger woman. Of course the apartment was lonely, but everywhere she saw evidences of the Boy—his favorite books, his faded housejacket still on its hook, the old brass jar that he had brought triumphantly from a dingy slum shop. The very draperies at the window showed the impression of his taste, and, beyond the window, one could catch a glimpse of the park—"A jolly, friendly little park," he had called it.

"I, too," the stranger woman was speaking again, "will spend Thanksgiving day alone. I will spend it alone in one of the great houses across the park—a correct, dignified house with fine old mirrors that reflect stately hangings and carved furniture. Everything will be neat and clean for the holiday, and my butler will see to it that the dinner is perfect, that it is well served, that every detail is as it should be—on Thanksgiving . . .

"I, too, had a baby. I, too, knitted socks and feather-stitched jackets for him. He"—the stranger woman's voice faltered—"he only stayed for a very little while. And then my life was lonely"—her voice was firm again—"lonely for the love and laughter and happiness that you've had for—for . . . How old did you say your son was?"

"Twenty-five," replied Marcia Allen, "twenty-five."

"For twenty-five years," continued the stranger woman, "you've had the joy of caring. When my husband died my life was empty. I'd give everything in the world if I might have kissed away bruises, and I'd have worked my fingers to the bone if I might have had a son to send to college. I'd have walked, barefoot, across a continent to make a home for him—if he'd only stayed."

THE room was very still. Marcia Allen, her eyes fastened on the picture of Boy, was looking past it into the life of another woman, into a life that had been robbed of sparkle and struggle and joy.

"I didn't know," said Marcia Allen at last, "I didn't know. And yet," she added, "my boy's gone, now, too!"
